Miss Hazard's Christmas Letter

Mission Hill, Santa Barbara, Cal.

December 1, 1908

I want to send a few lines of Christmas greeting to my dear girls, from this far western shore. It is hard to realize that it is a west coast in Santa Barbara, for as I write the path of the sun is as the path of the just, a shining light, on the sea full to the south of me. It is early morning and the sun has come up out of the sea. This miracle can only be performed in winter time, when it is low in the heavens, and it can do it only because the Santa Barbara channel runs almost east and west, at right angles to the general trend of the coast. And here I am back of the mission, which was founded by the Franciscans late in the eighteenth century, in the midst of a garden of palms and accacia trees, with oranges hanging thick amid their glossy leaves, and palms with gold and purple tree blue gray among them. Roses are blooming, great bushes of them, taller than I am; and lemon verbena had to be trimmed, which was half again as high as the man who was cutting it. It is such a paradise that it keeps one busy just looking about and enjoying.

I had not been here since the first year of my coming to Wellesley, and so there are many changes, and much to do, for trees had grown so as to shut out the mission town against the sea, which was the chief beauty of the place. Now they are back again, and I can rest from my garden labors at gardening!

This I will tell you, that I am better and stronger already, and am assured that before very long I shall be perfectly well, and ready to go back. I hear the angels ring at six every morning, and reflect that it is nine o'clock with you, and work for the day is just beginning. Before long I shall be with you, but I want you to think of me as in a garden of Eden, surround

Samson Agonistes

The Milton class of Wellesley College presented "Samson Agonistes" on the night of December 9, the three hundredth anniversary of the poet's birth. It was a tribute essentially appropriate, for as Professor Bates said in her welcome to the audience, "Who is so fitted to praise Milton as Milton himself?"

Beethoven's "Eroica" is said, "Samson Agonistes" is particularly difficult to stage. The whole interest depends on a declamation that will bring out the nobility and beauty of verse, and the intensity of feeling in the long speeches. We have a record of but one other attempt to produce it, that of the Elizabethan Stage Society of London in April, 1900, and that attempt was marred, if we may trust the critics, by frequent prompting, and by the introduction of music into the choruses, which seems essentially unifying to the classic severity of the poem. The Milton class was to keep this severity and dignity. And by their feeling and appreciation, combined with the understanding of the audience, they achieved an unusual success.

The keynote of tragedy was struck in the beginning with the gripping entrance of thelettered Samson, "blind among enemies." Miss Kilborne gave a consistent and understanding presentation of the character. Hampered by chains, limited in expression by closed eyes and formidable beard, she yet sustained with feeling and substance the note of hopeless anguish.

To the despairing Samson before the prison comes a small band of the people of Israel, the members of the chorus. These in oriental costume, rich in bright color, formed a picturesque and appropriate background throughout the rest of the play. The distribution of the speeches of the chorus among the individual members was ingenious, and of value in lending variety and life to lines which, if chanted, might have over-weighted the production.

The scenes of Manoah's, Dalila's, and Herapha's visits were well handled. Perhaps the giant erred on the side of too much realism, and Dalila on the side of too little, but in general the lines were well read.

The great scene was the scene of the climaxes, Miss Ruddiman, the Hebrew messenger, can hardly be too highly commended for her interpretation of her exceedingly difficult part. From the moment of her entrance, breathless with fear and awe, she gave a dramatic picture of the horror of Samson's downfall. Here she was most ably supported by Miss Douglas as Manoah, the reverend sire," whose flexible voice reached deepest pathos in the lines:

"The worst indeed! O, all my hope's defeated
To free him hence! but Death, who sets all free,
Hath paid his ransom now and full discharge.
What windy joy this day had I conceived,
Hopeful of his delivery, which now proves berth as the first born bloom of Spring's Nist with the lagging rear of Winter's frost."

The best testimony to the compelling power and intensity of this climactic scene was the way in which the imagination of the audience responded to the unheard cries, and pictured the great scene in the temple. Every eye followed the company of Israelites in their stately exit; and the last words, "Calm of mind, all passion spent" were succeeded by a thoughtful silence, tribute to the impressive dignity of the scene.

The cast in full was as follows:

Samson .................... Grace Kilborne
Manoa, Father of Samson, ................ Isadore Douglas
Dalila, wife of Samson ................ Marion Savage
Harapha of Gath ................ Helen Bennett
Public Officer ................ Theresa Severin
Maire ................ Louis Ruddiman
Prison Boy ................ Helen Wallace

CHORUS OF DANTES

Jessie Fisch, Dorothy Bridgman, Genevieve Hodgen, Helen Adair, Katherine Johnson, Alice Appenzeller, Augusta List, Gretchen Harper, Florence Messer, Ethel Rugland, Geraldine Haines, Margaret Russell, gave an impressive performance.

The success of the play was due to the unifying energy of Dr. Lockwood, who gave inspiration alike to the small matters of costuming, and the large matter of interpretation.

The Phi Sigma Christmas Masque

The guests of the Phi Sigma Fraternity at their Christmas party were fortunate in being so early brought into the atmosphere of the beauty of the Christmas spirit, not only in the presentation of the Legend, but also in the spirit of the house. Long ropes of green entwined the pillars of the porch, graceful greens hung about the room, and mistletoe and holly radiated a Christmas cheer. From the minute the guests received glowing sprigs of hol dy, they felt as if they had some secret bond with the Christmas spirit and waited in eager appreciation for the Irish legend, "The Christmas Bride."

The first scene was in the home of Maire, a pensive young girl, who is to be wedded on the morrow. She celebrates her little brother and sister with tales of the Christ child and tries to banish from her minds all fear of the fairies who might harm them. But, nevertheless, they carefully set aside the rest of the milk to appease the fairies, and it is with great difficulty that Maire induces the children to give it to the weary stranger who begs it for her child. Shortly the mother comes home with greens for the morrow and brings a bit of hawthorne, the fairy's flower, and later when Dermot, the lover, gives her as a betrothal present little fairy pipes, stolen from the fairies, Maire seems bewitched by the fairy spell. She hears the music of the fairy group, and falls enchanted, bewitched, to the floor. In vain her mother and Dermot try to regain her interest and attention. She lies asleep, her spirit with the fairies.

The next scene is the home of the fairies; Finvarra, their King, lies in happy de light, at the feet of his new Queen Maire.

EDITORIAL

"By a peculiar weakness of human nature," says Schopenhauer, "people generally think too much about the opinion which others form of them; although the slightest reflection will show that this opinion, whether right or wrong, is not in itself essential to happiness." This tendency seems to be indeed manifest here in Wellesley. It threatens to develop from a "peculiar weakness" into a rampant abuse. For the sake of popular approval, we seem willing to commit all manner of petty, but none the less contemptible, offenses against ourselves, our friends, and our ideals in our conduct upon our own standards, but on what is expected of us in our small community. We seem bent on degrading our personal characteristics, ideals and aspirations, to say nothing of tastes and habits, into the narrow and shifting limits of popular sentiment.

We can pick out every day, girls who have spoiled an attractive personality by trying to live up to some reputation which has been thrust upon them and which they cannot live down, because when once we are agreed that a girl is a "snob" or a "shark," or what is worse,—a "genius," nothing can change our opinion. Perhaps the root of this slavish tendency is that we so seldom stop to analyze public opinion, and see just how little it stands for. We like to be flattered, we hate to be held in disapproval, and although we know a remark is a palpable lie, in either case we take it equally to heart. To quote Marcus Aurelius, "we foolishly stand in greater awe of our neighbor's opinion of us than we do of our own." So-called "public opinion" can, in the majority of cases, be traced back to one person, or a small group of people, who in the habit of voicing their sentiments and it is easier for some of us to let their opinion pass unnoticed, than to formulate one for ourselves and so doing, we tacitly uphold their ideas. We fail to take into consideration the people who think and who are not so prone to "talking." After all, public opinion can have very little influence on the real things of life. It is too intangible and fluctuating for us to take into consideration in any great issue,—why, then, should we be thus subservient in the petty concerns of existence?

"Merry Christmas"

To those who go: You need no merry Christmas. You plunge into three weeks of superabundant merry Christmas, three weeks of Christmas Holly and Christmas sermons and Christmas laughter and yet,—ours is the pleasant thought, that we lose the spring, we open the door to the great procession of good-will and cordial wishes with your just—merry Christmas.

But to those who stay: to those who wander through echoing halls, who wear continually a brave smile, who perchance plan their next home, who cheerfully hugging home letters, or persuade themselves, by oft repeated trips to Boston, that they are having a "splendid time."

Upon these we show indiscriminately the very cordial wishes, the brightest and best that cold-blooded black print and white paper can offer,—for a truly happy Christmas.

You will have leisure—blessed thought, for just now leisure seems to the makers of the black print, most devoutly to be sought, except that seeking involves the idea of effort. If the writer were editing a volume of "Opals from the Poets," the choicest quotations it contained would be about "Sleep that knits up the ravelled sleeve of care," and "Oh sleep, it is a gentle thing; beloved from pole to pole."

And editions of these "Opals" would be presented to all Wellesley girls. Sleep will you have, oh those who stay, and a leisure to enjoy everything that you play, and all your books, and all the friends whom you see. And in such leisurely enjoyment may you fulfill our wishes for a kindly, happy Christmas.

The annual College Settlements Association Doll Show was held in the gymnasium on Saturday afternoon. The decorations consisted of evergreens and cotton "snow." Over a hundred dolls were on exhibition, dressed in silk and gingham, baby dolls, and grown up dolls, making a very attractive showing. Candy was sold, and gypsies were there to tell fortunes behind screens. Music was provided during the whole afternoon by several excellent musicians from the College Orchestra.

The Deutscher Verein Christmas party was held on Monday evening, December 14, at the Agora House. A Christmas fantasy by Fräulein Steuven called "Knecht Ruprecht's Traum" was presented, the cast being as follows: Knecht Ruprecht, Florence Kunke; Ostera, Minnie Muirhead; Fricka, Alice Cary; Ruimpeltstilzchen, Eleanor Cox; Prinz, Marian Jewett; Prinzessin Brunhilde, Maud Muller; Kristkindel, Ethel Andem; Kinder, Charlotte Hudnut, Hortense Heath, Edna Blood, Mary Warren. Presents were then distributed to every one and coffee and cakes were served. The meeting adjourned after the singing of German Christmas songs.

Instructors of the Art Department have organized an informal evening sketching class, which will meet several times a month. The first appointment was held on Tuesday, December 15.

Two college girls, one from Smith and the other from Columbia, have been very successful in starting the first tea room in Los Angeles.

while other fairies kick their heels for joy. As Maire sits listlessly on the log, hearing little that is said, listening only to the fairy music, fairies flit in from their inquisitive travels. They laugh light-heartedly over the grief of Maire’s friends and secure in their new bride, “towners of a Friday night,” they sing and dance together. Then they come to her to eat of their leery food, but the Red Man, the fairy friend of mortals, warns her not to shun. One comes who has heard the Christmas music, and even as he tells it the strain of the solemn, sweet carol comes to Maire’s ears. In surprise, she listens, and then, recalling similar strains, she knows that she would away to her own people. Finvarra, with pathetic earnestness tries in vain to hold her with the fairy caress. “Listen,” he says, and the tragedy of the weep folk lies in his voice, “Hark to the music of the folk of everlasting youth. Wait I’ll hum it for your.” But Maire’s spirit is recalled to her people through the Christmas song.

The last scene is in the same room as the first, soft-shaded and quiet. Maire still sleeps as a changeling and loses in their sorrow her mother and Dermot forget everything; they do not remember to cover the fire nor can they hear the stranger’s knock. Only the little Fioll and Eileen hear it and open the door to the stranger who before has asked them for milk. She lays her child in the cradle and then helps them build the fire and listens to their tale of woe. Finally, she takes the little ones, which have lain neglected on the floor since the disaster they wrought, and plays on them a lullaby, to the child. Voices outside take it up, a light lies around the cradle and Maire awakening, half rises. As she moves toward the cradle, the stranger asleep, she draws from her outer hand the little strands before them, the Holy Mary, her arms uplifted in tender blessing while they kneel reverently before her.

The legend, written by members of the Fraternity, was wonderfully perfect in its simplicity, its melody and lyric beauty. It was like some bit of music, with only some strain running all through it, and this feeling was carried out by the far away carolling between the scenes. The interest lay in the simple sweetness and pensive grace of Maire, the bride, but the reverential spirit of Christmas and the Christ child pervades the whole story. The whole Mary’s face, peaceful and wonderful, sweet, had the ethereal charm of a dream face against the darkness of the pines.

“Awake! Awake! The tidings glad come forth and hear: In Bethlehem this day a Child is born.

“Ye no longer weep, ye no longer drear in doubt and fear;

Shall not your King be hailed this morn with joyful cheer?”

Sophomore Promenade

1911’s Sophomore Promenade for 1912 on Saturday afternoon and evening was a decided success—hostesses, guests, decorations, music, refreshments, were delightful; the most critical of observers could have asked for nothing better. Miss Kelley and Miss Goodwin were assisted in receiving by Miss Pendleton in the afternoon, and Miss Davis in the evening. The Barn looked supremely festive; it has seldom been so lovely, at least within this college generation. The cross beams of the posts were covered with Christmas greens, while the lower parts were gracefully massed with huge long-stemmed yellow chrysanthemums. The lights were shaded with great yellow chrysan-themums, too, and the softened mellow light greatly enhanced the beauty of the gay dancers and their best gowns; it was just such an effect as we dream of when we imagine our grandmothers pirouetting in the yellow glow of many candles.

But the guests can testify that their enjoyment of the promenade was not due to the decorations and pretty gowns only; they seemed thoroughly imbued with the Christmas spirit or, if they didn’t call it that, they surely knew how to make everyone feel greatly at home and very devoutly thankful to have been invited. The bandmaster could play, too, (as well as make announcements) and the music was the kind that “sets you going like a rumbustious jack.” What with genuine regret that we neared the end of the program on the tasteful little dance orders and we really meant it when we told 1911, that we had had a “perfectly lovely time!”

The Second Artist Recital

Ossip Gabrilowitsch played to a Wellesley audience for the first time at the second Artist Recital last week. The program brought out the wonderful technique and the mastery of his instrument which have made this young Russian, composer and pianist, notable in the musical world.

Ten per cent discount is given to teachers and students when ordering from this agency.

The terms are cash or delivery of the goods.

Address all orders, when sent by m.m. to

Historical Society Publication Committee, Natick.

The first part of the program showed great restraint in handling, and a delicacy in subduing the accompaniment to the theme. It is a Sehuhns’s number in its minor, the war of the Chopin sonata, perhaps not so well felt though the different movements were kept unified.

The Liszt etude was most brilliantly played. The audience was grateful for the Chopin Waltz encore, in which Mr. Gabrilowitsch revealed many hidden beauties. The descending series of notes in the accompaniment was emphasized as it is by few artists. The concert on the whole was one of the most thoroughly enjoyed of the Artist Recitals we have had at Wellesley.

Milton Editions in the College Library

In connection with the celebration of the three hundred anniversary of the birth of Milton, it may be of interest to know that the College Library contains a first edition of Samson Agonistes, and Paradise Regained. This little yellowed volume once graced the book shelves of Dr. Samuel Johnson, and bears his name upon the flyleaf with the date 1743.

In the exhibition in the Browning Room, on December 9, there was shown the second (1674) edition of Paradise Lost, a copy of the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1643) which provoked much controversy in Milton’s time, and a facsimile edition of the tract, Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, which Milton was commissioned by the Council of State to write in reply to Salmasius’ kingly defense, and which is said to have cost him the loss of his sight. Of fac-simile reprints there was the France’s from the first edition of Paradise Lost, and the Trinity College manuscript of the minor poems. The handsome folio of the Paradise Lost edited by Newton, extra-illustrated by thirty portraits of Milton, attracted especial attention. Biography was represented by the contemporary life of Milton by his nephew, Edward Phillips, which with the Camden reprint of Milton’s Common-place Book, made up a rather notable exhibition for a college library in the thirty-fourth year of its history. How much the character of that library has been influenced by the scholar-ship and cultivated taste of the founders of the college may be seen from the fact that of the total volumes exhibited, all but three, and of the contemporary editions, all but one, were from Mr. Durant’s private library.

Revised Rules of Chaperonage

The system of chaperonage in Wellesley has been a gradual growth. To the rules formulated ten years ago there have been added others, as the number of students has increased and the social life has become more complex. This accumulation of rules and regulations needed revision and systematizing. To this end a committee was appointed by the Director of Halls of Residence. The committee trusts that the Student-Government Association will find them helpful and adequate, and feels sure that each individual student, if she forgets not her corporate responsibility, will recognize the importance and value of each rule and her personal relation to it. Should any further explanation be needed, any member of the committee will be glad to answer questions.

OLIVE DAVIS,
Director of Halls of Residence.

The rules are as follows:

CHAPERON REGULATIONS

Note 1. Students living in village houses should apply to the Registrar for all chaperon permissions. Students living in college houses should apply to the Registrar only in the absence of the Head of the House.

Note 2. The hour for closing in houses upon the campus is 9:45 p.m., in the village houses 10 p.m. Guests may not be entertained after the hour for closing, and no student may be away later than this hour unless registered under the care of an approved chaperon.

No student may leave the house in which she lives earlier than 6 a.m. without permission.

I.

1. Unless on the official list, a chaperon, either for the night or for an entertainment, must be approved by the Head of House in which the student lives. (See note above.)

2. Parents are approved chaperons for their own daughters.

II.

1. Student-Government Regulations No. 2 is interpreted to mean that a student may not be in Boston later than 6:20 p.m. without a chaperon. (See II, 4 Student-Government Regulations for exception.) Arrangements for chaperonage after this hour shall be made only with the approval of the Head of House. A student leaving Wellesley with a chaperon for any evening entertainment must return to Wellesley with that chaperon. A student wishing to remain in town after an evening entertainment cannot leave her chaperon unless under the care of a second approved chaperon.

III.

1. A student wishing to lunch at a hotel in Boston should consult the approved list of hotels. A student must not be at any hotel after 6 p.m. without a chaperon.

2. A student wishing to spend the night at a boarding house in Boston should consult the Head of House concerning her arrangements. Attention is called to Student-Government Regulations III, 3a.

IV.

2. Men may not be taken to society houses on Sunday except by special permission. A student may take her father to society vespers. We realize the utter futility of conducting a campaign in behalf of expurgated vocabularies—many far greater than we have attempted it, only to fail miserably. Slang has become an integral part of our daily intercourse, but if we insist upon using it, let us at least use it judiciously. It is unfortunately true that we can nowhere display half so much originality and individual discrimination as in our choice of slang. Why not, then, forego such time-honored expressions as “lemon,” “pill,” “peanut,” “prune,” “grand” etc. These are absolutely unpardonable and there are a few others such as “dressy” and “nifty,” which are just trembling on the brink. We can at least discover some new epithets to apply to our friends and enemies. The animal and vegetable kingdoms, it is true, are well nigh exhausted, but we might try philosophical or scientific slang. At any rate, let us try to be original.

The Christian Association

At the Christmas service of the Christian Association, Thursday evening, December 10, Professor MacDougal spoke about the various familiar Christmas observances and especially of the Christmas Carol. He selected four carols which the choir sang—“God rest ye merry gentlemen,” “The Boar's Head Carol,” “Joseph and Mary,” a French carol, and “I saw three ships a-sailing.” These brought near to us all the joyful spirit of Christmas.

December Ninth

Samson, Manoa, and wild messenger,—
We thought they stood before us on the stage.
But soon were told that scholar players they were,
Renewing Milton's stately line, to celebrate
The birth of him, who seeing not, did sing.
There by Gaza's prison door strode Samson,
Still great, but broken now and blind,
Disheartened, crushed when on his present state
Of slavery he thought.
Came then friends from out the tribe of Dan,
Loose clad in flowing Oriental robes
That well did speak of Ancient Israel.
Slow through the listening throng old Manoa,
The chieftain's father, walked, disdained first
At Samson's hard disgrace, but later on
Returned to the father's natural love.
Scarce had he withdrawn, when Dalila,
Fair Dalila, and false, to mock her lord,
Did come bedecked, “with all her bravery on.”
To mock him, too, great Harapha of Gath
Strode heavy o'er the boards. And Samson now,
Feeling the presage of a mighty deed
Goes forth to glorious death.

They gave us long and satisfying feast.
But most of all we turn in gratitude
To her who guided them with loving thought,
With patient, wise control.
