Student Government Meeting

One of the most inspiring meetings of the Student Government Association this year, which centered about a very vital interest, was held Friday afternoon, January 29. The meeting was called to order by Miss Taft in the absence of Miss Hanford, who was ill. The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved. The motion was made and carried that flowers be sent to Miss Hanford from the association. The secretary then read the report of the Executive Board; eighteen cases had been discussed. The report of the House Presidents’ Committee followed; since December there have been 138 serious errors, 197 semi-serious errors, 235 permissions granted and nine privileges lost. Miss Taft then reminded everyone that only girls living in the quadrangle houses are permitted to ride on the street cars after half past seven.

The real business of the meeting, a discussion of the plans for the Students’ Building, was then introduced. Miss Taft read the list of the Undergraduate Committee, Caroline Vose, 1910, Chairman; Willye Anderson, 1909, Isadore Douglas, 1910, Alice Ake, 1911, Dorothy Applegate, 1912.

Miss Vose, chairman of the committee, read the report sent to the Committee of Trustees, for the investigation of a Wellesley Students’ Building in which conditions of eleven colleges and universities more or less comparable to our own were discussed. Of these eleven colleges, six already have Students’ Buildings, two expect them in the course of a year, and one is now working toward this end. The cost, privileges and accommodations of these buildings was then discussed, with extra emphasis laid on the fact that in no college has the support of a Students’ Building been found a burden. The keynote of our need is voiced in an accent from the Harvard Union. “Practically every college activity centers in the Union.”

The building is to contain a large auditorium in place of our inadequate Barn, a lounging and reading room for informal social acquaintance and finally a kitchen and small dining-rooms. The needs and possibilities of such conveniences were enlarged upon and compared with the present state of affairs. And in concluding the report, the committee laid particular

In these latter days it has been our privilege to witness acts of heroism and devotion to duty on land and sea, but heroism and devotion to duty are not confined to soldiers and sailors. We have seen a wife and mother leave the safety of her own home and her little ones to join her husband in carrying, humanly speaking “succor, help and comfort to those who are in danger, necessity and tribulation.”

The great ones of this earth have hastened to recognize their devotion to duty in offering to Elena of Montenegro, Queen of Italy, telegrams of praise and stars and Orders of Merit, but her afflicted people of Sicily and Calabria are giving her her heart’s desire, their loyalty, love, and admiration.

The present Queen of Italy, daughter of the reigning Prince of Montenegro, was born thirty-four years ago. Her childhood was quiet, but later she was sent to the convent school in Russia where the young Grand-Duchess and noble ladies of the empire are educated as befits their rank. On leaving the convent, she was taken by her mother, the Princess Milena, to Venice and there she met for the first (Continued on page 4)

EDITORIAL

One of the greatest problems which confronts us individually here at college is the question of what to read. Our time for such recreation is limited and the ground to cover is so extensive that we hardly know where to begin. We either voraciously attempt to devour everything we lay hands on or that is recommended to us, without pausing to assimilate our newly acquired knowledge or adopt a new train of thought to our general philosophy; or, in our desire to read only what is of the greatest instructive significance and value, we force ourselves to peruse volumes far remote from our interests and understanding—the sort of books one lays aside with a "Thank Heaven that's finished." This kind of reading, undertaken for the laborious purpose of "improving one's mind," is of no real value to us. It is like a concert which we go to because we think we ought and where the music thunders in our ears like so much noise, striking no answering chord in our nature.

We seem to feel that it is incumbent upon us to read all the more recent publications of the day, in order to afford ourselves subjects for conversation, and we have a sneaking sense of disgrace if we are forced to admit that we have not read a certain popular novel. Books are for enjoyment and for the development of the mind along congenial lines, not for the purpose of tiring the brain and weakening its powers of original thought by forcing it into channels into which it is incapacitated by nature, training or inclination to travel. It is not necessary to confine our reading to a limited number of familiar authors, and it is very true that fields of thought entirely unexpected by us are offered up by a chance book or article. If, however, we come across such a book, we immediately realize that it means something to us, and that it has a definite place in our thoughts, but if it is beyond us or does not make any personal appeal, we ought also to realize the situation and lay it aside until we have "read up to it" or thought up to it. If we persist in this promiscuous sort of reading, we lose more than half the significance of it. It is as if a person whose mind was not equipped by nature for the processes of philosophical thinking, and who had absolutely no training in that direction, should plunge into the vagaries and intricacies of modern philosophy. He would lose the true meaning of it all and most of it would seem to him mere blasphemy. Why not confine our reading to our own more vital interests? It is far better to be an authority on a few subjects than to have a smattering of all. Since we have so little time for reading, why not make the best use of what we have? If we wish to explore, we can explore systematically and more or less cautiously. We can cultivate a taste for any line of study if we begin at the right end. But if we are going to take things up at us merely superficially, we do not wish our minds to be an uncorrelated jumble of fads and literary caprices. After all the really great conceptions and ideas are remarkably few in number. Why not learn them from the works of the really great minds when they are at their fullest and best, rather than from the smaller copies and adaptations made by the lesser intellects?

College Notes

The college had an opportunity to meet Miss Goodwin and Miss Palin, the Alumnae Association officers, who were here on business concerning the Students Building, last week, at an informal reception, Saturday afternoon, in the Shakespeare House. The money which would have been spent for refreshments was given to the Students' Building Fund.

Thursday, January 28, Professor Hamilton lectured to the Freshman class on "Unity in Music."

The Glee and Mandolin Club Concerts this year, come on Saturday and Monday evenings, the 20th and 22nd of February, instead of Friday and Saturday. Tickets were sold on Monday.

Professor Macdougall lectured on "the Recurrence of the Theme of Music" before the class in English 16 on Saturday, 1910 held their class social in the Barn on Monday afternoon. A pleasant time was spent in dancing and renewing acquaintances. The proceeds of the sale of refreshments went toward the Students' Building.

Mr. Hoffman, in his lecture Saturday afternoon, will give an account of the aims of the Audubon Society and what it has accomplished. All members of the college are cordially invited.

Christian Association

The subject of the Christian Association meeting, Thursday evening, was "Signs of the coming of the Kingdom of God." The meeting was led by Miss Whiting, the head of the Astronomy Department.

one of how that the Princess did not at first receive from the Italians, that admiration which her character and unusual beauty would lead the Queen Mother to expect. Thomas went all that could be. His was an ideal, charming, gracious and "tantà simpatia," ever ready, with the right word, and a sweet smile for all. Her daughter-in-law, reserved, doubtless self-conscious, amid strange surroundings and an unknown tongue, was calm, haughty and cold. With the wisdom and common sense that distinguishes him, the young husband, during the years which preceded his accession to the throne, took his wife on long cruises to Italy, Spain, and other countries, but above all, surrounding her in the intimacy of life aboard ship with chosen company of cultivated Italian ladies and gentlemen in whose society she might gain the much needed freedom in conversation.

It was on one of these cruises that the news reached the Prince and Princess of the assassination of King Humbert, which was so suddenly to change the tenor of their life.

As her husband took upon himself the duties of his profession—for such he had been taught to regard it, Elena took up not only the duties of Queen, but also of mother, and it is to these last the Italians have said, half in admiration, half in criticism, that she has given her whole heart. Her hour has come at last and she pours forth her wealth of motherly love and sympathy on her suffering children. Who shall maintain that she too is not "simpatia."

As soon as news of the disaster reached the Quirinal Palace, the King and Queen hastened in their automobile to Naples; thence they boarded their royal yacht and set out for Messina, in whose ill-fated harbors, they anchored.

The King at once started organizing methods of relief, ever willing hand of rescue work. The Queen, with personal courage inherited from her own ancestors and fostered by the traditions of the House that is hers by marriage, overcame the physical, repulsion and weakness produced by the awfulness of the sights and sounds around her; with mind and heart and hand she comforted and soothed, there where all was chaos.

With practiced hands she cared for the motherless babies (one of them an orphan before her eyes, she carried to the yacht to be henceforth her special charge); dressed wounds, encouraged by her presence, the stricken victims and the faithful worker. The unfortunate around her were ready to kiss the hem of her garment, yet finding herself in one of the temporary hospitals and shelters during a recurrence of the earthquake, while endeavoring to alay the panic among the refugees, she was bruised by the rush of the half-crazed insane. Then only did she consent to leave for Rome.

Under her direction, rooms of the Quirinal have been fitted up as work rooms, in which clothing is being made for the needy, and here the wives and daughters of Orsini and Condulmer, side by side with the government officials and petty trades folk at the cutting tables and sewing machines, the more experienced ordering the less.

It was said of her father-in-law, King Humbert, it like circumstance; as his own hand the problem of perfecting our system of the tariff; that it is primordially an economic institution intended to be of service to the people and to bring justice into the commonwealth—and until we free the system of the present fraud and corruption inherent in it, we are lacking in civic truth and beauty, and in an idea of Justice. Andrew Carnegie has made concerning the tariff, illustrating his rich possession of a moral conception. We should endeavor to modify things, to revise the objectionable system.

What is true of the tariff may also be said of many national issues,—of the navy, war, and state departments, also, in fact, morals in the United States are at very low ebb, because our prosperity blinds us and, because we live in such a rush and whirl that we have no time for matters that do not pertain to our regular business in life. Just as we do not have time to find out what is going on in the world outside of the four narrow walls of Wellesley, while we are here in college, so the business man of our essentially commercial age: ponders over his means of making money and lets the country go to rack and ruin. Professor Zeublin was very radical. "Look at our pension list," he said, because we are big hearted and sympathize with the poor old soldiers that fought in our wars, we expend an enormous sum of money for pensions, a small part of which goes to the old soldiers, and a large part,—to graft? We have not moral character enough to investigate. After the Spanish-American war, the German soldiers who went over were entitled to pensions large enough to enable them to live comfortably all the rest of their days, without even thinking of service to the United States or Germany! We have recently prepared for peace, for building two yachts, each costing millions of dollars. With this amount of money, we could have been able to educate and train all the children of the seven largest nations of the world, the great majority of which, at present, are woefully ignorant in one respect, because we have no moral fibre,—no sound moral standard.

The same things are true of municipal affairs. A recent investigation in Boston shows a most disgraceful piece of fraud and corruption.

Our moral vision is sound in a negative way: we know how to criticise, but not to construct. In the religious and ecclesiastical life, we need to perfect our moral idea, also to get a more just and sane proportion of things. Mr. Zeublin spoke of the good of a great unied federated church, such as the English, Jewish, and Roman Catholic Churches, how they might work hand and hand with the State to promote justice, and to promulgate moral ideals. He insisted that the Protestant churches, with individual consciences, were no such aids.

As to the industrial justice, everybody should work to the best of their ability regardless of pay. It is hard when we are working at such high pressure to keep such standards before us. Professor Zeublin appealed to us as well trained women to use our whole energy and effort and influence to bring about just conditions,—it is a duty and a responsibility we absolutely must meet.

Professor Zeublin came out to Wellesley at the request of the College Settlement Chapter and we are very grateful to him for bringing us this vigorous message.

Prof. Zeublin's Talk on "Justice"

On Sunday evening, January 31, Mr. Charles Zeublin, Professor of Economics and Sociology at Chicago University, gave a most interesting talk at Vesper's on the subject of "Justice."

Professor Zeublin began his address by saying that since we Wellesley students are so completely surrounded by an environment of beauty, love, and truth, a fundamental characteristic of our life, he regards for Justice. He outlined his subject matter under the heads of Political, Religious, and Economic or Industrial Justice.

He plunged into the subject of political justice, with his customary energy and enthusiasm by reminding us that one problem of securing justice has the problem of perfecting our system of the tariff; that it is primordially an economic institution intended to be of service to the people and to bring justice into

Miss Butterfield then spoke of the Barnswallow’s enthusiasm in the project. They realize all too well the crying need of a Student’s Building. Their organization will not change, only the Barn will broaden and spread out,—a natural and necessary growth, for the Barnswallow has become much too big and fat for the nest.

Miss Zahorski next spoke of the universal need of the Students’ Building from two points of view, first the superficial social and second, the truly social. As superficially society, the need of a building in which students may entertain alumni and friends, a need which at present cannot be filled. As truly social she considered the advantages arising to the individual girl from knowing intimately the many girls with whom a Students’ Building would bring her into close communication—girls whose true worth she might get to know whose true friendship she might gain.

In a short and enthusiastic speech, Miss Willye Anderson then emphasized the sacrificing spirit of the Senior class—their willingness to labor for a place where we can all dance, for a grand big fireplace and a grand big fire.

Miss Margery Hoyt made an appeal to 1912 for their active support of the work, since they were in a position to judge the special need of a Freshman class for a closer intimacy, not only with the upper class girls, but with themselves. The Freshman class does not become acquainted with itself as a whole until the Freshman year is nearly over. As she said, 1912 does not realize how few of her fellow classmen she knows until she walks through the village with an upper class girl and finds how many more of the upper class girls knows. Class spirit must, under such conditions, be growing stronger, and it forms a double basis for that later spirit which must support Wellesley,—out of class spirit grows the larger and stronger college spirit.

The Student Government can scarcely hope to fill the gap in the social life of the College that such a close friendship with upper class girls brings all Freshmen to understand and appreciate Student Government.

Miss Margaret Wilbur suggested the possibility of using the Barn still more for social and informal occasions, while we were waiting for the Students’ Building. She suggested that the Barn be open every Saturday evening for dancing and an informally “good time.”

This closed the meeting and the association adjourned to Center to vent its enthusiasm in singing and cheering.

Mrs. Kelley’s Talk

Mrs. Kelley, of the Consumers’ League, spoke on Monday, January 25, of our opportunity as girls of this generation. It is easy to imagine that girls will come to college as safe, valuable, and happy to look back on as our own.

Mrs. Kelley pointed out that this duty is a greater one than ever before, because the number of factory girls has increased incomparably more than the number of girls who attend school. They are the living. Their lives are different too, as different from ours—so much more different than in former generations. Girls are doing the work that strong men did thirty years ago. They are doing dangerous, harmful work, and it is not only ignorant immigrant girls who are forced to enter upon this lowest grade of labor, but our own girls, whom we have permitted to grow up as unskilled as these. There are no laws to prevent this sort of thing, but how can we ourselves affect industry?

In the first place, it is the fault of women of former generations that girls avoid domestic service. The rumor reaches them sometimes even before they arrive in the United States that social advancement is barred forever if they once go into the kitchen. We can remedy that.

In the second place, conditions in stores must be remedied. Young and inexperienced girls very seldom receive high enough wages to live on, and if they keep to their work and scrup and save, as the Russian Jews do, the almost inevitable result is a gradual loss of vitality, and finally a complete nervous breakdown. The sudden rise of wages as a girl becomes more competent is likely to prove disastrous, because she often forgets to think of the time when there will be no work for her, when wages will either fall off, or come to a standstill.

Mrs. Kelley said that in years gone by girls didn’t go to college because their help was needed at home. They had to work. Now there is leisure for us because so many other girls are doing the hard work. This is surely an unfair division of labor.

Athletic Association

The idea is common that the Athletic Association hibernates, as it were, during these winter months, only to break its way through the crust in the spring. I wish to correct this impression and show that as an association, it has winter life which is quite active though not so manifest as that of the spring and fall seasons.

Part of its work is the planning for these seasons, the perfecting of the legislation of the sports that may be run in the spring as smoothly as possible with the greatest good to all engaged in them. A committee is working on the subject of costumes, trying to solve the problem of suitability, utility, and low cost. We are planning too, the opening of sports for all classes by applicant lists posted in succession in order of the physical exertion required for each sport, so that a girl found by the physical examiner to be unsuited physically to the sport for which she signed, may have a chance to apply for a sport involving lighter exercise.

The sports as organizations, do not lose their identity during the winter, for interest is held through the fun of little social gatherings, where informal games, jigsaw puzzles and popping corn are features, or perhaps a single team may decide to give its sister-class team a dinner.

The association wishes very much to develop this winter season by encouraging out-of-door recreation of every kind. It is the season of the hardest study, therefore it should be also a season of plentiful relaxation in the crisp air to keep the mind and spirits in good tone. And so we rejoice to see snowtracks over the campus, cross-country walking notices on class bulletins and have an Ice Carnival Committee waiting to seize the time when weather and the social schedule will agree on a night. And for the coming mid-year period we leave this prescription—spend your free time out of doors! It has been tested and it works.
