The Department of Hygiene and Physical Education.

That the Mary Hemingway Hall and the Department of Hygiene and Physical Education are realities is being gratefully recognized, and coming in from now that the classes are organized and enthusiastic reports come from each one. The Hall, itself, is one of which we may justly be proud, so that we feel the faculty and students are united. It is designed to meet the requirements of the course for the training of teachers in hygiene and physical education and to provide a gymnasium for the entire college. The equipment and plan throughout are admirably suited for this purpose. There are the administrative offices on the main floor, with classrooms and study halls for the second floor. A large corps of directors can be assisting at one time. At one end of the gymnasium is the bowling alley, about twenty feet in length, with an adjoining room; it is not unusual to have sixty customers present at any time. The room is constructed withPanama cloth, and the floor is covered with soft wood. At the other end of the gymnasium there is a large gymnasium, with a room for two basket-ball courts, a double tennis court, and a large pool. The pool is always full of people, and the apparatus that allows the chief fascination of the gymnasium is the water. The college has a balcony containing about two hundred seats, from all of which the entire floor can be seen. The gymnasium is a part of the building, which is of the highest degree, and the building is by far the best in the country. One hundred and twenty dressing-rooms and sixty baths are provided for the entire school. The dressing-rooms are well lighted, and the floors are lighted and the rooms are also lighted, and the ceilings are white. The doors are made of solid wood, and the windows are of glass. The seats are well arranged, and the seats are arranged in rows. The gymnasium is well lighted, and the windows are large and well arranged. The gymnasium is furnished with a great many surprises. Here are the stock-rooms, where the twelve hundred suits are kept. After the recreation is over, the doors are opened, and the people can be seen from the outside. The gymnasium is a fine place for the students, and the gymnasium is well arranged. The gymnasium is well arranged, and the doors are open. The opening of the gymnasium is a great surprise. EDITORIAL.

Sobriety is perhaps not a virtue to appeal to youth in any time, but certainly not to that unenlightened mass which is gathered on the Wellesley campus. We desire to be unconventional—except where unconven-tionality interferes with our "vested interests," Nietzsche, Haeckel and Shaw are our gods, and to live with them in a maze of piquant con-tradictions, is the acme of self-satisfaction. Yet though we seek after the unusual, though, according to womanish custom, we long for the Romantic (in a new form, to be sure), the result is most disappointingly prosy. Underneath the veil of gay paradox, sparkling and changing in color as new lights are thrown on it, is a solid block—unmoving, dead. In speech we are interestingly rash, but in action—we are not even dead, for we never were alive. And isn't this just because we are so impossibly rash in our expression? None of us think of living according to Nietzsche, though we may exercise our minds and tongues upon him. At first sight this makes it seem as though our somewhat showy un-conventionality must be quite harmless. It isn't. It divorces our thought from our action, our principles from our conduct in such a manner as to prevent there being any practical gain, any real advance. If the veil were not quite so glittering, perhaps we might see the stolid form beneath. It is a wise commonplace of Bishop Butler, which says, "Things and actions are what they are; and the consequences will be what they will be; why then should we desire to be deceived?" And to realize its truth is to think soberly, to be a little less ready to leave old standards when a new be found firm enough to make a foothold for conduct, and then to make them a foothold for conduct, would mean infinitely more value in our opinions. For now it is true that those who profess faith in the old order as well as those who hanker after the new, have absorbed this pleasant idea of principle as an ornament to life, a curious problem for discussion but without a restraining force or action. Convention, not conviction, is the rule of conduct for both, whether the expression be conventional or unconventional.

A curious illustration, in a small way, of the divorce of "faith from works," occurred here last week during the Boston elections. In the first place, although every one who has reached the college stage of civilization, possesses the utmost cynicism in regard to newspaper truth, there was in all the condemnation of Mr. Fitzgerald—and it was all condemnation—no supporting proof offered except the statements of partisan newspapers, and the innuendos—not proofs—of a curiously personal Finance Commission. Then, the judgments were conventional in the extreme. The most devoted student of Nietzsche did not profess to admire his "circumvention of men" in Mr. Fitzgerald, but condemned throughout those qualities in him which he believed him to possess, and theoretically ought to admire. In narrower spheres of conviction the contrast was even more striking—girls who in college talk interestingly and at length on the cause, with a capital C, meaning thereby Socialism or Suffrage, did not know the attitude of the candidates either towards the laboring man or towards women as a class. The divorce of their action from their ideal is so absolute that it never occurred to them to look up the candidates' opinion—but that did not hinder their decision. Mr. Fitzgerald offered an old age pension for city employees, and stood for the city as a model employer, "a fair day's pay for a day's hard work and an old age assured." But the conventional prejudices for Back Bay Respectability as against Irish American Politics was too strong for these preachers of the brotherhood of man to see the possibility of this entering wedge for Socialism. Perhaps it would be wise to say that Mr. Fitzgerald is not a Socialist in conviction; his works are better than his faith!

The election discussion as an illustration for my text is no doubt somewhat far-fetched; there are many and more pertinent illustrations to be found nearer home. But we are all more conscious of this—and perhaps a little bored by them now. If you are not bored yet, you might find it an interesting exercise for your imagination to consider soberly how curiously you would act if you should make your actions jibe with your professed convictions.

COLLEGE CALENDAR.
Saturday, January 22, from 4 to 6 o'clock. A reception given by the Seniors to the students in the Physical Education Department.
Monday evening, January 24, at 7.30 o'clock. A lecture on modern opera by George Coleman Gow, professor of music at Vassar, illustrated by Jean Sinclair, a member of the Vassar Music Department.

COLLEGE NOTES.
Those who knew Miss Hill's devotion to her subject will be interested in the following announcement which promises success for her. It is from the Boston Transcript of January 12, 1910:

"Educational dance as developed in Wellesley College by Miss Lucille Eaton Hill and her student associates, is now recognized as an original and concrete factor in educational progress. It is proposed to bring the subject to the attention of the public through diverse channels of experimental application in Boston, under co-operative management through a central office. At the close of a definite introductory period an announcement will be made."

Until then the correspondence address will be St. Botolph Studios, 20 St. Botolph street, Boston, Mass.

At the next meeting of the Alliance Française, to be held on January 22, at 7.30 o'clock, in the Shakespeare House, the members of the Faculty are to present a play, entitled "Les Deux Sourds." The cast will consist of Mlle. Regnécé, Mlle. Sératon, Mlle. Debris, and Miss Alice Leavitt. Mlle. Regnécé is in charge of the play.

The Student Volunteer Band has invited an invitation to the college at large for an informal discussion of the Rochester Convention considered from a new point of view, to be held at the Agora House at 4 P.M., Sunday, January 23, 1910.

There was an ice carnival last Monday, January 10, very successfully managed by Miriam Carpenter and her committee, Helene Williams and Persis Pursell.

The meeting of the Christian Association was held in College Hall Chapel, January 13. The subject was the Rochester Convention, and the meeting was in charge of our general secretary, Miss Button. Miss Davis, Frances Gray, Carol Williams and Miss Kendall each in turn told us of the great convention and of the inspiration they had received from contact with so powerful a movement.

On Saturday evening, January 15, a Masquerade Dance was given at the Barn.

was first seen at Whittin Observatory, December 8, as a hazy, tiny star of about the thirteenth magnitude. Within a few days a star-like nucleus has been detected with the twelve-inch telescope. This comet in its absence has covered the orbits of all the planets twice. It is now within the orbit of Mars, moving with increasing velocity towards the sun. The sublime thing is that astronomers so perfectly understand the laws of gravity that, allowing for the influence of all the planets whose paths it has crossed, they could predict its return and where it should be looked for—and it is "on time." February 7 a lecture will be given before the college on this comet by Professor Brooks, the discoverer of a score of comets.

ART EXHIBITION AT FARNSWORTH GALLERY.

A delightful exhibition of pencil sketches and etchings by Mr. Hornby, recently held in the Boston Public Library, has attracted much favorable comment in Boston. It is, therefore, a pleasure to announce that Mr. Hornby has very kindly consented to exhibit the collection at the Farnsworth Art Gallery for a short time. The exhibition will be open from January the twentieth to the thirtieth and it is hoped that many will be able to enjoy it.
Lecture on “Parsifal” by Professor MacDougall.

On the afternoon of January 12, in Billings Hall, Professor MacDougall delivered a very interesting interpretative lecture on Wagner’s opera, “Parsifal.” This is the last of his operas and is one of the most characteristic of Wagner’s third period of composition. It is held by many to be the most eccentric of all his operas. The New York critics considered it a complete failure, when it was produced there some years ago. However, the enthusiastic exponents of Wagner adhere to the opinion that it is his greatest achievement in the operatic line.

The plot of the opera is somewhat as follows: A knight named Titurel is custodian of the Holy Grail and of the lance that wounded Christ. He built a castle in Spain and trained a noble band of knights. They held these sacred relics in solemn custody. Every year they celebrated the Eucharistic ceremony during which a dove descended and gave renewed spiritual strength to the knights. In the neighborhood dwelt a man named Klingsor, who possessed certain magic powers which he used for wrongdoing, and who sought allegiance with the Evil One. Around his palace he had a garden, half flowers and half women. These magic beings seduced the knights of the Grail, under the instigation of Klingsor. Amfortas, the head knight, fell a victim to their wiles, and in a personal combat with Klingsor, he was wounded by the sacred lance, and this relic came into the latter’s possession. At the opening of the opera, Amfortas is suffering from the wound he received, which cannot be healed unless touched with the lance. This lance—so it has been told the knights—can only be redeemed from Klingsor by a “Guileless Fool.” Then the knights shall forever be released from Klingsor’s sway. This Guileless Fool is Parsifal.

The opening scene shows Parsifal in the act of killing a swan. The Knights of the Grail are shocked at this, but they take him to the Temple of the Holy Grail and he attends the sacrifice in the chapel. He sees and understands Amfortas’ suffering and resolves to redeem the relic. Another interesting character is that of Kundry. She is supposed to have been Herodias in a former existence—the one who mocked Christ on the way to the crucifixion. She was the chief instrument in the seduction of the knights. At times, when directly under Klingsor’s influence, she is a beautiful woman. At other times she is a humdrum sort of creature, dressing in a way that is entirely unlearned, and acting in a half-mad fashion. At such times she visits the knights—but after each visit something evil comes to them, so that they come to regard her visits with distrust. Kundry is the one chosen to work the spells on Parsifal. He, however, resists. Klingsor appears and hurls the lance at Parsifal. But it is suspended in the air, seized by Parsifal, and as he waves it, the magic castle tumbles to the ground, and Klingsor’s power is gone forever. Kundry eventually is baptized, and Parsifal, after healing the wound of Amfortas, is made head knight of the Grail.

Professor MacDougall then proceeded to play and explain the main themes in the opera. The first one was the Grail motif, which is one of the strongest. When the prelude to the opera ends, Wagner finishes it with a few very light chords. Then the curtain goes up and discloses a form, and Gurnemanz, with two esquires, GRADUATES' CLUB.

On Saturday, December 11, Miss Pendleton and Miss Calkins gave a luncheon for members of the Graduate Club. The guests were received in the Faculty parlor at College Hall, where the new members of the club had an opportunity of meeting the Committee on Graduate Instruction. Miss Hazard made a short address, speaking of the meaning and privilege of graduate study and commenting on the great work which has been accomplished in the past by graduate students at Wellesley.

The speeches which followed were given between the courses at luncheon. Miss Calkins welcomed the new members to the fellowship of the club and spoke of the necessity of a common social tie between students engaged in lines of work that tended so strongly towards specialization. Miss Risley, president of the Graduate Club, breathed the secret wish of every graduate—that some day there may be a special home for the club where all may be together. Professor Ferguson of the Botany Department made the closing speech, telling of graduate work at Cornell University. She spoke particularly of the great value to a student of the interest and sympathy of other workers engaged in similar lines of work.

The meeting was closed at the end of luncheon that the members might attend Mrs. Snowden's lecture.

Wellesley, stop introspecting and analyzing your motives, and dissecting your conscience, and plucking out your peccadilloes, and tearing out your few good, ordinary faults till there is nothing left of you but an attenuate ideal! A vulgar philosopher said that a reasonable amount of fleas was good for a dog, because it kept him from worrying over being a dog, and, not to carry the analogy further, Wellesley is ideal enough now, despite the existence of societies. If we could go direct to some other ideal place after Commencement it might pay to keep on planning off the rough spots at Wellesley, but we have to go into a very unideal world, and I believe that college which fits its graduates to meet unpleasant fortunes with pluck and serenity is the college which does its graduates the greatest service. And the only way to develop these qualities is by having medicine to take, and taking it. A snail makes very good progress on a pebbly road, but put him on a sheet of glass and he sprawls. If we must abolish societies, do so on the ground that the girls in them are losing valuable opportunities in self-control and character building which the exclusion gives to the non-society girl. In my day we had a better opinion of our non-society friends than to think they needed every straw removed from their path. I am sure that many of them got as much pleasure from societies as the few got pain.

One Alumna who was not invited to a society till her Senior year said that it hurt her extremely at the time, but it did her character more good than anything else at college and helped her to meet easily later and far more serious troubles.

Don't make Wellesley so ideal that we are dazed for a year or two after we get out in the world. There are ups and downs in the world; give us a chance to train for them a little at college where there are so many compensations to console us. Equalization comes in the fact that all of us aren't down all the time. The non-society girl emerging into the world often rightly enough takes precedence of her society sister. Sometimes she marries while the society girl remains single. Then she has a house, and enjoys its privacy, while the other girl has none. Fellow spinster, shall we abolish marriage?

The weak girl will always be unhappy, but the same girl will make capital of her loss; so why destroy the comparatively harmless pleasures both of the society girl and the non-society girl who enjoys the hospitality of the houses for the sake of making hardship easier for one who will find unhappiness anywhere. We soon forget our unhappiness, but our pleasures are very valuable to us later on.

How would Hercules have been, asks Epictetus, had he said, "How shall I contrive that a great lion may not appear to me, or a great bear, or a savage man? And what last thou to do with that? If a great bear appear, thou wilt fight the greater fighter."

WINIFRED HAWKIDGE, 1906.

In reply to Miss Case's Free Press of last week, I may affirm that, whether it is the opinion of the many or the few, there are surely those who believe firmly that refusing or resigning from the Wellesley Society has done and will do some measure of good. Otherwise we should never have had the problem. The example of every girl, not necessarily the girl of 1910 and 1911, but each one of the long line of Alumnae stretching into the past who has refused society membership—the example of every girl who, realizing the futurity of one or two reformers in the midst of thirty complacent beings, has followed up her realization with resignation—has substantially contributed to make the present issue possible. And should societies continue in their present form, just so much will the refusals of 1912 and 1913 and all the coming college generations aid in satisfactorily adjusting the society problem.

III.
As a Wellesley alumna and a member of a Wellesley society, I am protesting against Miss Rothey's designation of the present discussion of college societies as an "hysterical agitation." I have been reading the articles which have appeared in the college papers with a great deal of interest and, if I dare to speak in evidence of the spirit in which the problem is being approached, I submit that it is a most healthy agitation. If it is thought best to submit the question to the Alumni, as Miss Rothey suggests, I think the case will be disposed of easily and quickly. I feel that the majority of Alumni of over five years' "growth" would vote gladly and cheerfully to abolish what, considering the prejudice one of the undergraduate, is a survival of the past. Fräulein Müller speaks of the "Alumnae who toiled unceasingly and sacrificed much to build up these charming houses. I think I may wear the halo among the lost of that noble band." Long before the Shakespeare House boasted its present lining of cack pandule and burlap, I pounded my fingers black and blue nailing strips of green denim from floor to ceiling, and did various tasks in the effort to make presentable what was then a shell without an interior. But I do not weep sentimental tears over all those "years of unremitting toil." Rather, I feel keenly disgraced when I think of the years spent in a cottage at Wellesley which, on Saturday nights, all but two people from the floor on which I lived, flattered off to society meetings, indifferent to the pangs which it would be fantastic to suppose did not attack the left-behinds. The worst of it was, these left-behinds were superior to most of us in scholarship and in general ability.

I have never forgotten the confidences of a non-society Wellesley girl who once happened to have her steamer chair beside mine on an ocean steamer. It was when I had been out of college only a few years and it did not impress me then as it does now. She told me her college years had been embittered by the existence of societies. She was afraid to cultivate the friendship of some society girls she longed to know because they were society girls and that, although she had been out of college eight years, she had never attended any reunions because of the old bitter feelings which swept over her at those times. I acknowledge this girl was painfully sensitive, but it is not true. Rather, I feel keenly disgraced when I think of the years having her full quota of sensitive people. At any rate, whether the case was exceptional or not, the recital of that girl cancelled for me once and for all the idea that societies have a divine right to inflict torture.

We who are doing any sort of social work preach and practice, to the best of our ability, brotherhood. When we establish a "social center" in a neighborhood we arm everyone to "fall go" and make it a success, arguing via the local papers and our friends that the time is past for cliques and sets and factions of one kind and another and that, rather, let us realize the nobler spirit of a reality only when and where we are "sisters together." College girls certainly ought not to require much thinking and talking to be convinced that they, of all people, must get in line with the spirit of the times. MARY B. GIULSON, 1899.

ALUMNÆ NOTES.

In addition to notes concerning graduates, the Alumnae column will contain items of interest about members of the Faculty, past and present, and former students.

Reference in another column to the recent death of Professor Morgan calls up a commanding figure of earlier college days. A graduate of Oberlin College, and the daughter of an Oberlin Professor, Miss Morgan brought to Wellesley a rich inheritance of character and inspiration. Those who knew her at her best were charmed by the unique personality, the energy, the vision which made all things new. They will be lost in gratitude for the life which has now closed its earthly course, not mourning that their guide, philosopher, and friend, after years of decline and weakness, has passed out of that "finite" which with irresistible blending of humor and pathos she used so frequently to deplore.

The great success of the presentation of "The Tonga Trip of 1908" by the Chicago Wellesley Club was in large measure due to the work of members of the original cast, not members of the club, who came to Chicago for the production; and also to graduates of other colleges who lent their aid in a most generous spirit of cooperation. After $1,000 had been paid out in expenses, $2,000 was cleared for the Students' Building Fund.

An Indiana Wellesley Club has been formed recently. Meetings will take place at some time in the Christmas and summer vacations. All who would like to become members are requested to notify the Secretary, Miss Elizabeth C. Everitt, 5831 East Washington Street, Indianapolis. The other officers elected are Miss E. T. Shulbrick, president; Mrs. J. C. Moore, vice-president, and Miss Stella Morrison, treasurer.

Miss Juliette M. Fraser, 1899, is teaching Latin in the new High School, Honolulu, T. H.

Miss Mary T. Noss, 1909, is teaching Music, French and German in the State Normal School at California, Pennsylvania.

* Miss Gertrude G. Fisher and Miss Josephine T. Chase, 1909, are assistants in the Histological Department of the Board of Health Research Laboratory, New York City.

Miss Edith Bryant, 1909, is teaching Latin, French and English in a school for girls at Washington, Connecticut.

Miss Elizabeth Gillespie, special student 1884-86, is teaching in the High School of Norfolk, Va. Her present address is 604 Botetourt Apartments, corner Botetourt and Bute Streets, Norfolk, Va.

Miss Nina L. Marshall of 1895, who has been a science teacher in prominent schools of New York City since she left college, is now lecturing on science each week in the school of Mrs. Finch, New York City. She has also lectured before various clubs, and no one familiar with Miss Marshall's writings and with her work as a teacher can fail to expect success for her in this new field. Miss Marshall's present address is 124 E. 58th Street, New York City.

Miss M. Lois Stone, 1909, is assistant in the Harwich (Mass.) High School.

PARLIAMENT OF FOOLS.

SORORICIDES.

Aye, tear those battered emblems off
That long the snob have graced!
For many an eye has glared to see
That pin upon that waist!

Her room once resounded with tea
Where knelt the Sophomore crush,—
While crowds were peeping in to see
How fared it with the Rush,—

No more shall feel that Sophomore’s tread,
Or know the conquered knee;—
The Harpies of the Sore have plucked
The Eagle of her Tea.
