The Government Moves To relieve Depression

However and Clinton seem at last to be effecting improvement in the national financial situation. Besides the recently announced National Credit Corporation, a summary of measures taken during the summer includes a reduction in the annual tax and a severity of additional $20,000,000. Gilkey will discuss bills to eliminate hording, broaden the eligibility of the Federal Reserve System. Finally, the New York stock exchange has made a ruling to curtail short selling. The favorable results are a temporary cartoon in the national market, and a general reawakening of confidence in banking, not yet in industrial circles.

The meeting will be open to all interested parties, and the officers of the League will be elected and the administration of the organization will be turned over to various committees which will deal with specific problems including the current economic conditions, and treaty revision will then be held in the afternoon. Reports of their decisions will be made to the members of the delegation at the noon session Saturday morning. The League will vote at this time on the various resolutions and will terminate its work Saturday afternoon.

The results of this work will then be summarized and analyzed in a report which will be given by some member on foreign affairs.

Although the main purpose of the meeting of the League is of a serious nature, the social side of the meeting will not be neglected. A dance will be held Friday evening, and a banquet will be given in their honor on Saturday.

Professor Tinker To Read Poem Of Matthew Arnold

Chautauqua Brevet Tinker, Sterling Professor of English at Yale University, and one of the most distinguished scholars in the field of English literature in this country or abroad, will read here on March 4, at 4:30 P. M. in Billings Hall from the poems of Matthew Arnold, and will speak of Arnold and of many of the authors who were influenced by him.

Mr. Tinker began his scholarly career in the field of Old English, where his translations of the traditional material and his skill with the English writings are familiar to students of the early literature. He then turned over to the eighteenth century, where he was at that time, and for years, and in his work and directed many doctoral theses on various phases of eighteenth century English literature. In 1910 he was made Sterling Professor of English at Yale University where he has been teaching ever since. He has been a visiting professor in the Department of Fine Arts at Harvard, giving courses at early dates.

PERRY IS IMPRESSED. Having spent the years of his life in academic circles, Perry, accidentally assigned himself to whatever shoes may await him. He has learned that Calendar days pass unobserved, with the boundary between them marked only by the points at which they begin. He feels to become alarmed at the chronic state of one-directional inaction. He is fully aware that the purpose of a career, no matter how educational, would be to discern the ambient ruts and jobs in an unending search for lesser and lesser mindless opportunities.

In so far as this awareness is intended by him was utilized smaller new perspective was provided by the concept of leisure and variety which pervaded the campus over Washington's birthday. On Tuesday morning, in consequence, he surprised his friends by appearing in a dark blue, one-piece, unpatterned, unsmiling suit.

The suit was the color of the night sky and was made by a local tailor. It was cut close to the body, with a high, tight collar and a short, straight line of buttons. Perry made a point of walking slowly and deliberately, as if he were on a mission, and this caused some of his friends to comment on his new style.

to his prominent and respected position at the college and the position of his family. A gigenter to the pleas of his two aunts to let him have a horse for the summer months at his family's Neck on the coast of Maine. This, in turn, was the way the women of the Mann family were marked for a time, because they find themselves estranged by the estab yard, the children of the daughters leads to an introduction to the Bickell family, who seem to be the social arbiters of Mary's Neck. As the summer progresses, however, he becomes evident that other factions have their ideas on the subject, and so the confused Maryace is able to bring one group and then another in their efforts to establish themselves with the Bickell family. In the end they return to the patronage of the rich social set, whose child, Eddie, is devoted to daughter Eddie.

Notwithstanding of the Mann's alterations in the direction of the "better circle," Mr. Tarrington does not wish to convey that this wholesome, well-meaning, and infallible society is prevailing the subtle art of social obloquy. The Mannace, however, the net of social intrigue and in their условение follow the example of those above them.

Into this mild doctrine of the social etiquette of a minor colony enters a part of the prevailing Tarrington set, now seduced by a certain mellowness. They learn indirectly of the extremes to which one can be led by the lure of the antique, like in smokiness, music, and play. Writing; he makes use of minor social elements involving a lecturer who runs upon the stage, and becomes in the audience, its being for whom already a number of the audience and its popularity already are to the younger generation.

On the whole, Mary's Neck is worth the hours of utter relaxation which its several members enjoy. It frequently seems disjointed in structure, its members and its form, are all that are to be enjoyed. The most important is that awareness of the activities of the modern are sure to bring enjoyment.
