Acknowledgments

Thank you to my advisor for dedicating hours to reading drafts, listening to ideas, giving feedback, and offering endless encouragement. Larry Rosenwald was the first Wellesley professor I ever encountered when I visited his American literature class as a prospective student four years ago, and I am so pleased to have had the chance to work with him on my thesis. A thousand thank yous to him for taking the time to work with me and for enriching my experience at Wellesley.

I also owe debts of gratitude to members of the English Department at Wellesley (particularly Bill Cain, Kate Brogan, Tim Peltason, Yoon Sun Lee, and Paul Fisher) for answering questions and suggesting further reading, to Tom Hanson of the German Department for answering questions about German literature, to Ato Quayson of the Newhouse Center for giving feedback on my drafts, and to the librarians at the Margaret Clapp Library for helping me track down books and giving me access to the first editions of Alcott’s novels in Special Collections.

Another thank you goes to the Houghton Library at Harvard University for giving me access to the Alcott family papers and the original manuscript of Jo’s Boys (it was a remarkable experience to hold it in my hands).

I’d like to thank my family and friends for offering me patient ears when I was excited about an idea (or just wanted to complain) and for showing interest (real or feigned) in my work. A special thank you to my mother for always listening. As Jo March put it, “What do girls do who haven’t any mothers to help them through their troubles?”

I will miss the email threads, coffee dates, and late night chats with the other honors students in the English Department (especially Esther, Sarah, Marissa, and Meredith) and the support of my unofficial Wellesley big sister Angelina Del Balzo, who cheered me on and was always ready to give advice. And speaking of coffee dates, this thesis would have gone nowhere without Peets Coffee & Tea, the café that gave me caffeine when I needed a boost and herbal tea when I was over-caffeinated.

Last, I would like to thank Louisa May Alcott for writing books that still fascinate and inspire after all of these years.
