THE MILLION-DOLLAR ENDOWMENT FUND.

The Alumni General Endowment Fund Committee thinks it may be of interest to Wellesley Alumni and former students to know how the work of the Million-Dollar Campaign is progressing. It therefore proposes to publish through the News, frequent reports of committees organized and working by them. The aim of the Central Committee is to establish, as far as possible through Wellesley Clubs, committees which will carry on the work in every state. Below is given a list of chairmen appointed up to date, and the results obtained by those committees which have been organized long enough to have received their first returns. In addition, the committee is glad to report that it has itself secured the promise of one hundred thousand dollars for the Fund, conditional on the raising of the whole amount.

Boston Club Committee, Chairman, Daisy Durcher Hammond, '91.
Berkshire Club Committee, Chairman, Grace Perry, '81.
Central California Club Committee, Chairman, Ethel Glover Hatfield, '90.

THE FAIR.

Did you, on Saturday last, wear a tag which read "Wellesley-Student-Union Building FAI-2?" We trust that you did, but if for any reason you did not, we can only extend your hours of sympathy. For the great majority of us who did, our Christmas shopping is not only begun early but well, for we went to a fascinating market at the Barn, and came out laden with all manner of everything between yellow chrysanthemum and bonnet cap.

As we entered our attention was caught by a screen of snap shoes of Wellesley views, events and girls. Here we had ordered some of these, we could step in behind and have our fortunes told, or, if our affairs were already settled, we could pass on to many alluring booths. The candy table held a central place, of course, and beyond it, on the Barn stage, was a Japanese tea room. On either side were all kinds of fancy tables, with a more than usual assortment of the useful and the purely ornamental. One could invest carefully in a towel, an apron and a restful well-chosen picture; or could paint the room hidden with all manner of bags, bands, and cushions, feelimg hopelessly broke and benighted, which last is really a pretty good feeling to indulge in for the Student-Union Building! One could also buy at the general aid table, and at that of the Consumers' League. But we will not further describe the wonders offered for modest sums, for the party is over now. We will merely summarize the result of the sale. So go ahead!

Helen Mofatt should feel proud of herself. So should Dotty Rahn, Caroline Taylor and many others who worked not only at the booths, but behind the counter, for the Student-Union Building is simply on its way, when such persevering work is being done each year. It seems a long time off to some of us, who heard it all four years ago and are just hearing about it still. But we can all help to make a larger effort by our own efforts. Let the Fair just be the beginning of this year. Save up for the Student-Union Building!

CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

"The Biggest Opportunity in Four Years," was the subject of the Christian Association meeting of Wednesday, November 12, and by the time Miss Davis, Miss Mills and Miss Burton had finished speaking, the audience was fully aroused to the possibilities of the opportunity and its obligations. The principle work of the year was the recognition of the National Student Volunteer Conference held once in four years, and this year to be held in Kansas City from December 13-January 4. Wellesley has an active record and the following delegates are from the faculty members. This fact is an indication of the vital interest of the whole school; the Board of Editors have worked to please not only 1913, but every class that claims Wellesley spirit.

The booklet will reach you by mail; it will bring Wellesley before your eyes.

On Thursday morning last College Hall lives met a sad surprise on their way to breakfast. Center was draped in black crape. They wondered if Flurta was dead, then suddenly remembered whispers and faint clears of the night before. The Sophomore Chapel, with solemn rites, interred their mathematics. Clad in long white robes they had escorted the Shades of Algebra, Geometry and Trigonometry to their final resting place. The next morning the signs of symbol of their goddess were displayed, not, it must be confessed, without some of those minor jubilations which are said to accompany a Roman Wake.

And now this is the past that we trust that the Sophomore Class will lay mourning aside and pursue Comp II and Bible I with undiminished ardor.
THE SCAPEOAT HABIT.

One day last week two members of the College, in the course of their wanderings about Boston, dropped in at a noonday service in a certain old church. The interior of the church was restful in its ancient dignity; the service was quiet and simple, and these two wanderers, weary of shopping and laden with bundles, enjoyed the change from the bustling city outside, and felt as if they were really getting quite a rest. Their peaceful ruminations, however, were soon rudely interrupted by a man who got up in the pulpit and talked for about five minutes, so vigorously and so accusingly that the audience was quite squirmed in their high-backed pew. He talked about the "scapeoat habit,"—that convenient process whereby we lay the blame for all our wrongs before the head of some innocent and unsuspecting goat, and send the poor beast pocking off into the wilderness; after which we inherit a sigh of relief, that the burden of our transgressions has been so cleverly transferred. Yet one will ever suspect that the faults were really ours. This habit is, of course, a survival of an ancient Hebrew custom, only the real flesh-and-blood goat is done away with in these days, and his place taken by a poor, ghostly semblance of the animal,—made up of so-called "adequate excuse." Here the two culprits were just about to put themselves on the balance, in the assurance that the excuse for their shortcomings was adequate; but not at all! They were startled by the declaration: "Excuses and reasons are very different things. All excuses are lies; to give excuses for one's shortcomings is forgery." We have all who choose unfavorable circumstances having forced us into wrong doing; the fact remains that we are endowed with a free will of our own, and if strong enough or weak enough to face unfavorable circumstances we must own up to our weakness, and not lay the blame on some poor goat. Even the fact that we have inherited, from some more or less distant ancestor, a bad disposition, is not an "adequate excuse." For giving free vent to our temper?

These two members of the College (whose names we forbear to publish), came out of that church feeling that they had been hit fairly and squarely; had had much complacent self-satisfaction knocked out of their shoulders, and had received in exchange a rather heavy burden which they thought they had sent pockying off into the wilderness, under the care of a goat!

Since their return to Wellesley they have been in a constant state of abnormal exhilaration. "What a world!" said one to the other, "there are some unassuming friend, quite certain that she will be given an "adequate excuse." But no; the picture of an innocent and over-burdened scapegoat men before the eyes of the two enlightened ones, and they hang their heads in shameless silence. They have caught themselves a hundred times a day, trying to summon up the visionary goat to take their place; but all their papers unfinished, diseases cured, threats unfulfilled, bills unpaid, and all sorts of opportunities to slip. They really do feel rather bashful now about using the goat. But he is still at large in the College grounds, and really overworked, poor animal. Who the man was who told them about these goats two re- presentants do not know; but they are grateful to him, and they wish that the rest of the College might have heard him.

BASEBALL VS. GOOD GOVERNMENT.

In the local pages of a recent number of "Life," there is a short article giving an account of the trial of the government of the United States before Judge Destiny. The officer who made the arrest named most serious charges against the prisoner, but when the Judge asked for the complaisant, the People of the United States were quite satisfied with the way that they had failed to appear. "They are all busy, your Honor," he said, "playing baseball and attending the moving-picture shows." There was a long silence in the court then the Judge said, "I can't hold you, my friend, because the principals in this case . . . have failed to appear."

This is a hard blow against the people of the United States. It shows the absurdity of a country whose citizens enjoy practically unrestricted voting privileges, yet do not take the trouble to vote. It shows a lack of interest in the public welfare, either constructive or destructive. Only the theorists investigate the wrongs in our government, and although the people as a whole have vague ideas of what is wrong, they are too busy, too eager to be entertained, to realize that there is anything serious the matter.

One of the most frequently heard objections to granting the suffrage to women is that they will not care enough about voting to vote if they are given the franchise. But it is long been recognized that we are deprived of any share in the government, in fact their interest has been so discouraged, that there may seem to be reason for the charge. As a matter of fact, recent statistics from California as given in the November "World's Work" show that though the percentage of registered women who voted was less than the percentage of registered men who voted, the difference was not great, being in Los Angeles fifty per cent, of the women as compared to fifty-eight per cent of the men. But the per- centage of both men and women seems very low; too low to make our government by the people, and far from it makes it certain that the government will be for the people. The problem which not only the suffragists, but the country as a whole has to face is the education of public interest. . .

We rather pride ourselves as college women upon our broad view of the world and its events. We say we are learning to see current events in their proper proportions, and so we are training ourselves to be exceptions of education. But the trouble with our view is that it is so general that we entirely overlook the details, the particular happenings in the world which are of the greatest interest to most of us to pick up the paper on November fourth, and find that the day before had been election day in Massachusetts. Of course, you may say that Massachusetts doesn't matter so much, it is just a way, so what is the use of bothering with its government; but the fact remains that we are spending the better part of four years within the bounds and unable to see the ways of the wealth of Massachusetts, so that its affairs may legitimately claim a share in our interest. Did you happen to know, by the way, that Massachusetts elects a new governor every year? How often does your state have elections?

But even a worse ignorance was shown the other morning when an instructor remarked to her class, "It looks very much like war, doesn't it? I'm afraid it can't be avoided." And then as she noticed the dazed expression on the faces of half the class, she added, "Of course I mean war with Mexico." The class was relieved. They had heard of some trouble with Mexico; they had even heard rumors of some fighting down there. But Mexico is so far away, and "one is so busy at College," that they hadn't taken the trouble to find out anything about the matter. Mexico isn't a mere play to read the newspapers; it is rather a question of how we are training ourselves to be citizens. It is very likely that we will all some day have the privilege of active citizenship, and it is well not too early to begin to think of our individual problem of the education of public interest. We are having—we even demand—the same oppor- tunities as our brothers at college. Please don't let us spend all our time on baseball and the "movies!"

"GOOD" COLLEGES AND "BAD."

Sometimes you cannot appreciate a good thing until you see a bad one of the same sort. We students and graduates of Wellesley call ours a "good" College, but do we know all that we mean by that? Beautiful campus and buildings, large and efficient Faculty, unusual opportunities for many-sided development? All these, surely—and one thing more, that we do not always appreciate, a feast in undergraduate days.

The men and women who planned Wellesley knew their business, and among the most eloquent testimonials to their wisdom are some of their regulations as to the curriculum—rules that most other colleges, if they were to keep their笼 in shape when we have to do with a college when they manage things differently and not so well. I am thinking of one such now—a huge institu- tion in a large city, denominational, largely disfrac- table, but with generous state support so that it does not have to be run parsimoniously. Probably its students are quite as wicked; the defects of its instruction appear only to those whose experience has been with better colleges. But its graduates—who are legion—have an education that is little short of shoddy; superficial, scattering, unscientific. It is doubtless better than none, but it is not a real education, not even a college. It ought not to entitle the student to any sort of degree. The contrast between its regimen and that of Vassar, Wellesley, or any of the more distinguished men's colleges is stark here; a concrete instance.

At Wellesley a Freshman is limited in her course to five or six subjects, usually general, fundamental subjects. At this other college a Freshman may elect as many as twelve subjects, ranging far and wide over the whole curriculum, unrelaxed, and regardless of prerequisites, enrolling Chinese Art and Jacobean Lyrics and Plane Geometry. But this year\nwhen Laxon had last year (her first) a two-hour Latin course, being one hour of Horace one week, one hour of Livy the next, and one hour each week of prose composition; so that her total of Latin and extensive Latin for the year was about fifteen recitations each of Horace and Livy, and thirty of prose—in a class of nearly fifty! How much did she get out of such a course? Beside the Latin she\nhad eleven subjects, reciting twenty-three hours a week—not more than two hours to any course.

It was all elective except Bible, and she had no advice of any sort in her choice. Her curriculum was consequently of the widest, untamed variety: Plane Geometry, Greek Art, Roman History to Augustus, French Revolution, Latin, Stereography, Biology, French, Economics, Bible, English and something else—my not-taking pencil stopped for breath at that point! This year she is piecing\nout her rather irregular history course by taking the Middle Ages in two hours; and adds to this twenty\nhours of English Essayists, Clever's Letters, Bookkeeping, New Testament, History of Architecture, Physics, Physiology, Ethics and beginning German. In the words of the post—can you beat it?

No advice from anyone older or wiser, no requirements as to prerequisites or majors—no anything but a sweet, irresistable young ambition plunging eagerly into a mud jumble of pseudo-learning and coming out of it a half-cooked B.A.

You can imagine what the faculty are like—a collection of Admirable Criticisms. The gentleman who lectures on Egyptian Dynamics also reads English history and gives botany quizzes. If no one elects Commercial Law this term, the Commercial Law “Professor” turns to giving lectures on Thermo-dynamics or Middle High German Roots.

This, if it gives a college a character, is one of the ways in which Wellesley is run right. Instances like this of mis-directed zeal should make us Wellesley girls stop and consider the worthlessness of some of our academic regulations. If sometimes\nthey seem to you fuzzy, unreasonable, inconvenient, think what a college is like that does not control and limit you in the way you elict your course. After you graduate you find plenty of reasons to justify those very regulations—forsake the total of unvaluable part of the fact that you have a good rather than a bad education. Don’t ever forget that in\nthe long run the men and women who direct Wellesley College know how.

We Publish with Pleasure.

I hope the Editors of the News will follow, in just one instance, the journalistic method of the eloquent Mr. Bok, and publish a sincere testimonial to the excellence of their own efforts. Since I am writing as a private citizen, as just the average "Handy Reader," I shall refrain from comment upon the effectiveness of the English in these editorials. It is the matter that concerns me now. On recent issues of the News, I have turned to the\neditorial page with an avidity similar to that with which I seek Mr. Norman Hapgood’s current pronouncements upon feminism in “Harper’s Weekly,” and when I bought Harvey’s latest judgment of a Democratic administration in the “North American Review.”

Such editorials as the recent ones on “Office Holding,” and on the Mexican situation, show a creditable tendency to react intelligently upon Life and thought outside the campus, and then to bring the wisdom gained from these extra-mural reactions to bear definitely upon problems close at hand. Surely this sort of co-ordination between college and the world is acceptable to even the most im-

A NEW WAY TO KNOW THE FACULTY.

It has been said that books are the precious life-blood of great men; through his writings we may get a truer and more intimate knowledge of a man's inner soul than through two semesters' attendance at his "fat homes." There is a corner of the third stack of the library rarely visited, known to few. Upon those shelves, dim and cobwebbed with disease, stand bound volumes of back numbers of the Wellesley College, Prelbaek, Legenda and Magazine. Do you realize that many of our Faculty were reared within the same walls which now shelter us, that they once "ran" the College, and were, like us, (?) the mainstay of its publications? You have only to look through the age-yellowed pages to find the revelation of their aspiring young hearts in essay, story, and song!

PROFESSOR PALMER'S LECTURE OF THE ELEVENTH.

So far, Professor Palmer has dealt with two opposing types of poetry, the descriptive and the ideal. Chaucer described the world; Spenser described our aspirations. In theory, at least, ever, there arose a revolt against him, which found expression in a school of poets called by Dr. Johnson, the "metaphysical," but which Professor Palmer says might be much better described as the "psychological." Men were not content with either of the first two types of poetry; they felt that through the medium of verse they must express themselves.

This feeling was the natural result of certain conditions in the English life of the time; of a tendency towards individualism in men's conception of love, in their impulse toward religion, and in their desire to work. The lady who is the subject of the love poems of Spenser's school is a general, unapproachable type that does not satisfy. She is always coiled, forever inspired. In the course of time, individuality on the lover's part was bound to appear, and the question arose: How would a poem be written if it were addressed to a real lady? As a result of this, genuine love songs appeared in the new school. This same tendency toward individualism appeared in religion, Puritanism, with its passion for individuality, took the place of the old social religion. The necessity for a new form of poetry to give expression to these tendencies, gave rise to the psychological school of poets. The men of this school have a disposition for enjoying the unexpressed, the new; they call on their readers to exercise great intellectuality; their verse is hard to read, their thoughts often hard to interpret.

One of the most well-known members of this school is George Herbert, who lived from 1593 to 1633. Though he has been called "Holy George Herbert," such an epithet is, perhaps, too cold and impartial a one for him; for it is easily seen in his poems—such as "The Ambassadors," "Gethsemane," "The Purple Sea," "The White Sea," "Paradise Lost"—that one side of his nature was always fighting against another. He was brought up in a devout and literary atmosphere, and, after he was graduated from Cambridge, became orator of that university, an office that gave him great pleasure. But he had always intended to be a priest, and many of his friends expected him to take orders. He hesitated long between the two callings, but finally decided to become a priest. Many of his poems are, doubtless, a record of this struggle that went on within him.

He recognized that poetry must deal with love, but not in the loose way in which it had been treated by some of the poets before his time. He dedicated himself to the "fulness of love," and, deciding to follow the same method that other love poets had followed, endeavored to trace out all the steps in the approach of our love to the eternal love. In these love poems of his, the very of the believer is always clearly in evidence; the love element and the religious element go side by side. He had no great flow of poetic power, but, by his insistence that words should be as his thought, he achieved a strong individuality of diction. He contributed to poetry a nicer sense of form, the conviction that form shall be dictated by the matter dealt with and give to religious thought the conception of religion as a song of love from the individual soul to God.

A. B. AMONG THE HELLENES.

The whirlwind set me down on a populous highway in Greece. An excited man in a blue tree-day costume was approaching me rapidly. He pointed to the ground and, with a frenzied glance, seemed to ask me a question. My brain reeled—I groped wildly in my verbal centre for the Greek I had learned in Wellesley.

"Hoy polli," I finally answered, taking the spelling for granted.

The man clenched his fist and shook it at me, shrieking. I gripped my waving hand and firmly pressed the veil with my thumb.

"Katharia," I said with as much composition as I could muster, "Kathakeon kath-holloo, panta ogy.

"Hulay, astheze," I yelled, but the crowd turned not aside. He wrenched my hand loose, pulled it down to the ground, and placed it on my shoe base. It had come untied. Glowering into my face, he rushed past me into the hurrying throng.

DISTINGUISHED WORK OF AN ALUMNA.

It is well to keep in touch with the Wellesley Alumnae who are doing interesting things. When the world outside is waking up to their ability, their own Alma Mater should not be backward in her praises.

It is therefore with special pleasure that the News calls attention to the recent book of one of its Alumnae, in order that friends in Wellesley and out may extend the hand of congratulation.

Gertrude Schopperle, of the Class of 1903, who took her doctor's degree at Radcliffe, and followed this with a year at the University of Munich and two years at the University of Paris, where she did unusually brilliant work, has just published her research of the Tristan Legend in two volumes. The work has already had extraordinary recognition from German and French scholars. It is one of the most noteworthy works produced by a Wellesley graduate.

AUNT HARRIET'S CHAIR.

So many letters have come in relating to the football season, that it would be impossible to answer each one individually. Four hundred and ninety-seven called for an explanation of the game. I realize that our feminine youth is largely untrained in the annals of football. I do not regret it, for the actual game itself is barbarous—worthy of the old Romans in the Colosseum. I can but bid my dear young readers, if propriety forces them to attend, that they confine their attention to the part of the game which takes place on the grandstand. This I shall now attempt to elucidate.

AUNT HARRIET.

FOOTBALL FROM THE FEMININE VIEW-POINT.

The game begins upon arrival. Seats are of three kinds—quarter-back, half-back and full-back. If it is possible to influence your companion's choice, secure the latter type, as the barbarous details of the field may from that point of vantage, be obscured by the more pleasing panorama of the latest millinery. Let your eye take in the richness of color. Train yourselves to notice contrasts. The warm orange of a feathered plume, against the living brown of felt—those are the symphonies that make life worth living, and we have them about us every day.

At one end of the field, you will notice a large scoreboard. This is known as the score for, you refer to it, semi-occasionally, when it becomes time to raise your voice. For the most part, however, you can take the hint from your companion, and follow him. There is several manœuvre, which will furnish you with a clue. It is very important for your personal safety that you follow my directions with care. There is the manœuvre known as the Kick-off. This is distinguished by a great pounding of your companion's heels upon the sod, (sometimes accompanied with naughty language). When this occurs, you should kick slightly also (be careful of your shoes!) and occasionally give vent to a ladylike ejaculation. ('Oh my!' and 'How wonderful!' are quite strong enough.) The most alarming occurrence, however, is known as Forward Pass—for at this time it is quite necessary that you rise and pass forward to a safe place, beyond the radius of your companion's whirling arms. This span will not last long, but it is well to be forewarned.

With this previous knowledge of a few of the major points, I hope that my correspondents may become sympathetic and earnest companions at the Yale-Harvard game. Remember always to look for something beautiful. Notice the shades of red and blue which combine best, and write me about it. And above all, use the influence of your attendance at these games, to put an end to these barbarous practices which are causing our civilization to deteriorate.

'I have two bids to the Yale-Harvard game. Three of my best friends have asked me for the extra man. What shall I do? I would like to give him to all three.'

This is a very difficult situation and one demanding a great deal of tact. I should say that it would be best to carefully and patiently explain to the girls the nature of the case. Then, analyse the characteristics of the three girls and of the man, and make an impersonal combination. I am sure that then the affair will come out for the best. You might, perhaps, decline the second invitation and thus avoid the necessity for choosing at all.

"In your News of November 6, I saw the phrase 'Going thru Harriet.' What is its meaning? I have consulted the Encyclopaedia Britannica and Harper's Dictionary of Antiquities and cannot find it.

Pil Beta Kappa"

This is an expression current in one of our large women's colleges, and is a form of entertainment. Million refers to it in L'Allegro as "Linked sweetness long drawn out."

"I have an example which I simply cannot do, and a solution is necessary for my degree. Can you help me?"

Let me—the amount of time required for preparation of each lesson.

MRS. McCARTY SPEAKS HER MIND.

Good mornin', Mrs. O'Flaherty. Shure and Oi'm feelin' fine. Oi've just been readin' the papers. Faith, and these are thrillin' days, with Harvard considerin' war, and the President's daughter gettin' married, and college girls' manners gettin' worse. Haven't you been readin' of that new? Shure, and when you don't take the Boston American, you never get no news. It's after tellin' you how their table manners is degeneratin' completely.

"Say Oi to Michael as Oi'm readin' it. "'Tis no daughter of mine shall ever be goin' to Wellesley. 'Tis hard enough to keep her from usin' her knickers now."

Oi think its true, Mrs. O'Flaherty? That is a more serious question. But Oi ask you—When a girl must be learnin' Mathematics, an' French and Spanish an' Hygiene all at once, has she time to learn any manners? The Boston American is completely true.

Oi will make no such mistake with my daughter. She shall be finished at a school which teaches manners entirely. Would Oi have her be goin' out ter dinner an' not knowin' squash from turnip? Or do Oi want her comin' in ter a parlor the wrong way to? These are the dangers of a hoity edication, Mrs. O'Flaherty! And bejabbers, my daughter shall never be made to face thin.

PROFESSOR PALMER’S LECTURE OF THE EIGHTEENTH.

Professor Palmer introduced his lecture by showing that the most profound way of viewing a new doctrine was the discussion of what it meant and what it stood for. So in approaching the work of Pope, a poet adumbrated unpopular at the present day, the question is not whether the student likes him, but rather whether he understands him. What service has he rendered English literature which would, without it, have been manifestly the poorer?

Professor Palmer then openly attacked the limitations of Pope’s work, which to-day makes him unpopular. First of all, Pope has a most limited range. Not only does he deal with man, not nature; with the men of London exclusively; but even in these men he limits himself to the trivialities of courtiers, politicians, and men of literary circles. Even this narrow range is not profusely treated, for he deals with the commonplace and shows no poetical ability whatever. This treatment is seen to be limited by the incontinuity with which he wrote it and by the disjointed quality of his heroic couplets. Lastly, the character of the man, which shows throughout all of his work, is rather trivial, truthful, or sincere. As a contemporary of his said: “He could hardly drink tea without a straggler.”

In seeing these weaknesses the student must realize how very largely these are due to his physical condition; how he was born a cripple and suffered severe illness during his entire life; how he was thus unable to attain an education and to enter into the active life of the world. But he undertook the work he was able to pursue, that of a scholar, and so made his limitations the means of his strength that he has been called virtuously a soldier of literature.

In understanding his work at a remarkable young age, he perceived that the English poetry of his predecessors had become a tangle of words, unreal and fantastic; and that what the language needed was a correct standard of simplicity and clearness. In doing this he chose the heroic couplet, championing the type of pure literature in his endeavor to make his language swift, simple, and that which a delicate gentleman would use in his conversation.

JORDAN MARSH COMPANY

Though covering so narrow a range in literary work the result has been the clarity and precision of the prose and poetry following his time, for his aim was not to say things that had never been said before, but to express those best which had been said otherwise.

FARNSWORTH ART MUSEUM.

An exhibition of photographs of unusual interest has just been hung in the Art Museum through the courtesy of Miss Emma J. Fitz of Boston. The subjects are full heads and scenes from their immediate localities. The photographs form part of the large number taken personally or otherwise collected by Miss Fitz during her long study of the subject in the cities and towns of Southern Europe.

The localities represented are primarily Venice and the Adriatic provinces of Bosnia, Herzegovina and Dalmatia, and the period covered is from early Byzantine work of the 4th to the 9th centuries, through the later Byzantine and Gothic styles to the Renaissance. Some are in paved courts and cloisters; others in public squares and streets, or in gardens overhung with clinging vines. They are all full of sunlight and the reflected light brings out the beauty of texture. In addition, the photographs have an architectural interest, as many were designed by the architects of the palaces with which they are connected.

Miss Fitz has also many beautiful lantern slides of the same subjects, and all will show a few of them in the lecture room at the Art Building on Friday evening at 7:30. All who are interested are cordially invited both to the exhibition and to the informal lecture on Friday evening. The exhibition will close on December 13th.

ALUMNAE NOTES.

THE PHILADELPHIA WELLESLEY CLUB.

The Wellesley Club of Philadelphia extends a most cordial invitation to every Wellesley woman in Philadelphia or vicinity to their next meeting. This is to be held at The Holman School for Girls, 2294 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, on Saturday afternoon, November 22nd at three o’clock. There will be a short talk by Dorothy C. Mills, 1909, on “The Sphere Which the Alumnae Have in the Magazine, Helene Streeter, ’98, will give the address of the Juno Graduate Council meeting. Most important of all, President Pendleton is to be present and to tell of the Million-Dollar Endowment Fund. Mrs. Helen Foss Wood, ’94, chairman of the Club Committee for the Endowment Fund, will supplement Miss Pendleton’s address by speaking of the club’s relation to the Fund.

It is expected that there will be a large and enthusiastic meeting.

NEWS NOTES.

1909—For the past two years at the Allegheny High School, there have been given unusually interesting Christmas Masques, under the direction of Mary Moody of the class of 1902. One of the features of the masque is the seamless continuity of the story which unites all the various parts of the work. Incidentally, the preparation for the masque developed a quite new spirit of cooperation and respect for successful work among the faculty and board. The play itself, a morality play of real poetic beauty, was written by Miss Moody.

1913—Florence Kunkel, M.A. ’13, now assistant professor in the Philosophy and Mathematics Department of William Smith College, New York, entertained the College Club on November 11 at Miller Hall. President Powell, instead of Gertrude Wilson Powell, ’93, addressed the club informally on the subject of “The Old New England Town.” In speaking of the religious influence of the New England community, President Powell selected Jonathan Edwards as the highest type of the intellectual and religious passion which developed from the Puritan faith. He spoke also of the important influence of the leaders in the old New England town meetings, who moulded opinion and sentiment in the community through their power in law and public debate. Out of his own experience in a village near Northampton, President Powell told anecdotes to illustrate how the social life of the typical New England village centers around the post-office and “general store.” After the address during the informal reception, Miss Vera Neumann played and Miss Marion Holmes sang several solos. Tea was served in the drawing-room and the College housewives were given the opportunity to show off their sweet and savory wares. A credit is due the girls in the Department of Household Economics who prepared and served the refreshments.

Miss Margaret Bancroft, who took her master’s degree at Columbia University last June has returned to that University for another year’s study in Latin and history.

CHANGES OF ADDRESS.

Mrs. Katharine Norcross Beck, 1900, East Orange, New Jersey.

Mrs. Parker Allen Storv (Marjorie S. Lipe, ’10), to 813 Sixth Avenue, Syracuse, New York.

Murphy Bachelor, ’12, to Couribiere Street, Berlin, Germany.

Rea Schimmer, ’12, to 515 Sixth Avenue, Oak Lane, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Mary Laven, 1901, to 244 Centre Street, Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts.

For the school year 1910, to hold a position in the commercial department, the dances were under the direction of the teachers of physical training, the properties were made by the pupils in the manual training department, sometimes with intricate problems such as the wiring for electrical devices, the devices for making the dragon’s eyes wink and his jaws move, were most successfully worked out by the students. The teacher of sewing supervised the costumes, which the girls made at home. Since there is sometimes a tendency among more favored pupils to look down upon those who are taking the commercial or manual arts courses, it was eminently wise while to show the interdependence of all parts of the work. Incidentally, the preparation for the masque developed a quite new spirit of cooperation and respect for successful work among the faculty and board. The play itself, a morality play of real poetic beauty, was written by Miss Moody.
