1921’s Literary Contingent To The Front

NEWS Competition to Start Immediately

1921, all fall you have been exhibiting your ability in dramatics, athletics, and other college activities, and now is your chance to show what you can accomplish in the literary line. In March, when the old Board goes out with great reluctance and the new Board comes in with fear and trembling, a freshman will be given a chance to put her finger in the complicated pie called the Wellesley College News. There is little need to enumerate the distinct advantages of being an assistant editor on the college paper. To any one interested in journalism, it is an opportunity to receive training that will be decidedly valuable later in more professional work. To the girl who likes to write, but who does not intend to make her vocation, News work offers a field for interesting activity and experience. To all girls, work on the college paper means being in contact with the vital life of the college. Surely, then, there ought to be a greater number of you, 1921, who are eager to be on the Wellesley College News Board.

Hear then, all ye so inspired, and take note of the Competition which is to begin immediately, and which is open to each and every one. The purpose of the Competition is to assist the most capable girl of 1921 to a seat on the News Board. Here are explicit directions as to how to reach that lofty chair. First of all, turn to your right and firmly resolve to try out for the News. Once started in this direction you will find the rest of the road comparatively easy. Immediately upon turning to the right, proceed along the...

THE WHY AND THE WHEREFORE.

Whatever indications there may be to that effect, the object of this special issue of the News—the Magazine supplement—is not to prove that the literary taste and the literary ability of the Wellesley undergraduate are on the decline and have already descended to a deplorable depth. On the contrary, its primary purpose is to startle the Wellesley reading public into the realization that the News and Magazine are wasting here very much alive, ready to welcome its readers with a wish for happenings and less during the New Year and resolved to make their influence more powerful and more vital to the college during 1918 than ever before. The Board of Editors of these student publications are not the wooden organisms that their name might imply. Instead, they are wide-awake to the possibilities of undergraduate journalism and eager to introduce in the Wellesley monthly and the Wellesley yearly a new element of interest, of usefulness, and of progress.

The weekly especially, as the purveyor of news, is determined this year to look forward, not backward, to make its columns more entertaining, more profitable, and more up to the minute, by appraising its readers of events which are about to happen instead of outlining to such an extent as the events which have happened in the past. The News editors are fully aware of the difficulties which confront them when they adopt such a policy. Still, they feel that its advantages far outweigh the disadvantages as to justify the expenditure of increased effort upon the college weekly and with this final appeal for the assistance of the public, they prepare to embark upon the undertaking.

It is imperative, the assistance of the college public is for the success of the News's proposed policy quickly appears when its difficulties are pointed out. To send a reporter for a write-up of an event which has happened is a comparatively simple matter; to find out about an approaching event in time to give it to the college through our columns while it is still news is not nearly so easy. In fact, so long as the News must be supplied with information by reporters whose knowledge is finite, the latter task is an impossibility unless those faculty members and students in charge of college events are willing to take the News's representative into their confidence before they inform the rest of the college. The problem of meeting through our columns the demand for actual news is still further complicated by the fact that the News is a weekly paper and has to be printed away from Wellesley. Thus, the element of time comes into play. The editors must have the information which they possess by Monday morning at nine o'clock in order to give it out in print on Thursday.

We are always ready to do our part in coming after the news. Phone Wellesley 744 for a reporter. If you wish to call to the attention of the editor-in-chief. Remember that little things count in the News. The notice of the publication of your new book, your engagement, or your donkey military party may escape us unless you call them to our attention, yet they have as much a place in our columns as the report of the last Student Government meeting. Feel during this year that the News is your paper and boost for it whenever opportunity is offered. During 1918 help the editors to make the college paper interesting, useful, and progressive by giving them your confidence and by doing all in your power to open the way for the News to look ahead.

Why not try the News as an advertising medium? Unlike the bulletin and the poster, it does not wait for the student to come to it but instead goes direct to the student. If properly used it should become by far the most effective means of giving a college event publicity. The bulletins and the News are the college's natural vehicles for information and neither should impair the usefulness of the other. Try giving the announcement of that coming lecture or tea to the News ahead of time—the Editors can keep a secret—then put your notice and index on Thursday, the day the News comes out. Make Thursday the psychological moment for "springing the news." Then watch for results.

Don't forget when the News goes to press. We hate to disappoint you by refusing to print your contributions because they are received too late as much as you hate to be disappointed. On Saturday noon, the first installment of copy goes to the printer on Monday morning at nine o'clock the second and last installment is sent. Very important notices may be inserted when the proof is being read noon on Tuesday. However, the insertion of material on Tuesday is only possible when the News is not full otherwise. To accommodate a late comer, we cannot ask our printer to disregard an article which he has already set. So space is at a premium. Arrange for it early!

Pursuing Wellesley's Periodicals.

"A long, long time ago" Wellesley girls used to look eagerly for news of their doings in the Natchit Courant, which with agreeable condescension devoted one column to college events. A little later the same arrangement was made by a newspaper published in Wellesley Village. However, the system was so inadequate to meet the needs of a rapidly expanding and thoroughly progressive community, that in 1888 the college proudly produced a newspaper of its own. This first Wellesley newspaper was called the Courant, and was edited by Abbie Carter Goodloe, '89. There were four pages in this periodical; the front page was devoted to college notes (of a personal nature which the size of the college has since prohibited), the other pages contained stories, poems, and "such passages from current or classical literature as may be of value to students," usually moral in tone. But occasionally there would be a typographical error, which cheered and interested everyone, as in that Christmas issue where the college read:

"O little Tom of Bethlehem..."

Early days of Wellesley college were marked by an intellectual curiosity and energy, which at least partially accounts for the rapid development and changes in the college publications from the Courant onward.

Next year—1889—came the Prelude—gérn of the present magazine—a weekly paper in the form of a pamphlet. It contained an astonishing amount of material for a weekly—essays, editorials, stories, and reviews (which form the basis of our magazine) as well as alumni notes, college notes and calendar, and a column called Whom Ripples, parent to the Parliament of Frogs, all of which are gathered in by the present News. There were fewer outside interests at that time, fewer clubs and committees than we have now, and college interest, outside of the academic, centered in literary work. Still the importance of the college publication in that and in all times as the contemporary historian of the college is indicated by the frequent acknowledgment of the Prelude as the only or the most reliable source of information by Miss Florence Converse in her Story of Wellesley and other writers describing Wellesley's past.

In 1892 the Prelude, changed form and name, becoming the Wellesley Magazine, published weekly. Its first editor was Miss Florence Converse, known to us all. This magazine carried on the work of the present News, and to the list of the Prelude, added the Free Press column.

In 1901 the Wellesley Tea Room Corporation, strangely enough, started the College News, but in 1903 this publication was abrogated by the Magazine. The News then attained an individual editorial board, and for awhile both News and Magazine were published weekly, until it was decided to combine News and Magazine into a weekly with one literary number each month. This arrangement held until 1914, when the two publications again separated as a weekly and monthly under individual editorial management, but with joint business editors.

Wellesley's annual must not be overlooked in a history of undergraduate publications. The first Legenda was published by the class of 1890. A famous issue appeared in 1891. You must know that all Wellesley publications are under the eye of a board of censors. Even in '89 one girl felt the clutch at her skirts and wrote pathetically,

"I hear a voice you cannot hear
Which says I must not grind
I see a hand you cannot see
Which has my wit refined."

Nevertheless, grinds appeared with greater frequency until the copy of '91, which broke loose and grounded everything from faculty to elevator, in clever though sometimes ungentle witticism. It was an experiment, but not profitable. In fact, one member of '91 was farsighted enough to draft at the end of the Grind Department the legend,

"After Us The Deluge."

It seemed the end. But there are always optimists, and in the '92 Legenda someone chirps

"Legenda comes with stinging fun,
Epilept of '91,
After us * * *, but '92
Can soil an ark as few can do?"

Still, we have lived more circumspectly ever since.
I sit back comfortably in seat 69 of room 24. My body is relaxed. My tired note-taking hands are for once quiet. I am not thinking of anything in particular; my mind is almost vacant. My eyes idly watch a fly crawl up the back of the neck of the light-haired girl in front of me. The sunlight on my note-book is pretty. It moves back and forth, back and forth. The WHOLE WORLD is inactive, inert, pacific, tranquil, serene, peaceful.

Then from the calm,
"Will you give three reasons for your belief that you exist, Miss Jones?"
and I know that I have felt the "peace that passeth all understanding."

JULIA ST. JOHNSON JONES

THE RELIABLE FOUNTAIN PEN.

Never talk—to look. The Magazine recommends this pen to all its contributors. A large number of blanks makes the Board feel as if you had worked hard over a story.

POETS.

This is the sort of thing they give us
By the page,
Unblushing poets of this "Age
Of the Unskanked."
They write on "How It Feels to Take a Bath,
Or "Meditations on Math.," or
Or even "Shakespeares" or "Drops of Ink"—
Nothing too small or lowly for
Their catholic pen.
They write us sonnets on "A Mother's Love;"
They write free verse—like this—
That makes you wonder
Why verse at all? Why not
Good honest prose?
And blank verse of which the best
Is the blank part,
And odes and epics; anything
That ever poet tried they try again.
Yet blessing on their dripping fountain pens
And on their brains that hum
Withrithing with thoughts.
Perchance if thus their Pegasus
Learn to trot,
He yet
May fly.

RIMED REVIEWS OF "THE SECOND FIDDLE."

Our Stella was a poor clerk girl
A sunbeam in a murky city.
To see the scanty way she lived
Would wring your tender heart with pity.
An inch of dust ne'er seemed to give
Her godly mother's eyes distress,
Her mind was fixed on purer things
Than merely earthly cleanliness.
Her sister (poor deluded dame!)
Would rave and rime and versify
Till quite enraptured with herself.
Poor Stella could not check a sigh.

The father bent o'er specimens
Although his eye could hardly see 'em,
The story through he's occupied
Within a mossy old Museum.

Well, Stella met the fiance
Of Marian, her powdered friend,
And when she looks into his eyes
We guess the way the story'll end.

In brief, Sir Julian (he's the hero)
Goes off to Germany as a spy;
And when the strain and stress is ended,
Sir Julian is alike to die.

But Marian's both cold and haughty:
Sir Julian's too hunged up for her!
And so she throws the poor man over—
A slip of breeding, I aver.

Of course, 'twas plainly Stella's ear,
To offer him her love more stable,
To bind Sir Julian's broken heart
And broken limbs as far as she.

Our hero swears like fire-works;
And Stella's nose is retroussé;
Quite human both—yet now they live
In a really parlodious way.

Within an old ancestral hall,
In dim artistic candle light,
These two sit now with books and talk,
Right after dinner any night.

The plot, you see, is very simple,
The moral lesson clear as day.
If love-bumps pain you cruelly,
Try falling in another way.

And 'tisn't much of any riddle,
To guess who is the "Second Fiddle."

AIN'T IT A GRAND AND A GLORIOUS FEELING?

1. When one editor reads pages and pages of manuscript about "The Condition of the Mexican Indian in 1890" (with footnotes and bibliography) and poems on "The Feelings of a Fly in a December Snow Storm;" and
2. When another editor reads the Heretics' Bulletin "Magazine too High-Brow—Don't be so Literary;
3. When still another meets a member of the faculty, who warns the Board against lowering the high literary standards—a holy trust!

4. When all the editors have re-read the manuscript and have, at last thirty-six pages of "real stuff;
5. When, then, the Business Manager says "only twenty-four pages this month, The treasury is fast wasting away, cit!" and

6. In an conspicuous editor comes up behind two girls and hears one say, "I always read the Magazine. I wasn't that a good story Susie Sampson wrote last month?"

THEN
AIN'T IT A GRAND AND A GLORIOUS
FEELING, that comes over the Board?
THE STING OF DEATH.

When Jennie lay at Simpson with rheumatics laden,
Thinking that she must be for a casket destined
Her family, hoping only that they cheer the maiden
Sent a Telegram: "Hope Pain Lessened."

But the telegraph operator glanced the job,
Twisted the message with a fateful bend,
Jennie died when she heard the words,
"Dearest Child; Hope Painless End."

Really, these are two things
Every lady ought to do,
And if you would cultured be,
Do your wee bit too.

To knit must be the first thing;
Heel your socks with care,
Every row, you read a line.

Never get behind the time,
Every week increase your knowledge,
What is happening in college,
Study well the News!

IS IT NOT? YES!
Oh, delicious and strengthening!
WHAT?
NEWS AND MAGAZINE!
"One never tires of them."

INTIMATE CHATS WITH FAMOUS PEOPLE.

Notes: The following was written by a freshman addicted to "Joie de vivre," and possessed by the idea of imaginary write-ups.

After hearing Miss E—'s delightful talk at Billings Hall, I was eager for a few intimate, confidential words with her.

Consequently, dawn was soon crept up in the east when I knocked at her room in Tower Court.

I found her charmingly arrayed in a flouncy, lacy, pink and blue mystery most becoming to her steel green eyes. Her smile of greeting would have been worth any tooth powder advertisement.

"And who," said I, pulling out my little note book, "are your ten favorite authors?"

She laughed, a silvery sly-uh-bellish laugh, that splintered the air like jeweled leek!

"Ah," she said, counting on her rosedful fingers, "first of course, Will Shakespeare dear Will, what an interesting soul he must have been, I trust. That is the very spirit and we have a chance to meet some day—but now I digress."

"Adamas," I hastened to say, "diggessions from your lips are as petals to a flower."

"Well, next—Dostoevsky—(at least that's what I think she said) "ah, his force, his passion, his climaxen (here she began to pale the room) "this color, this shade, this punctuation, this graphegraphy, his transitions—forgive me, I will come later."

"But," I ventured, "are you always so far above us, even the words they want to soar above those in our presence. Then Ouida, and Conan Doyle and Robert Chambers—of them all she loved boys, and their styles so distinctive. But look, it is almost right o'clock. Dear friend, you must run. I must turn my five backgard somersaults."

When I desreet the landscape platform I am going to get a column in some magazine, and teach the world the way to be learned by a free booklet sent upon receipt of fifty cents, describing the marvels of back somersaulting.

"Take the advice of one who knows," (the laughing eyes shadowed with tears, and the firm, ringing voice mumbled down recovered in an instant to a dry bitterness.) "Ah, it was not friends, it was not the world, it was not me, made me what I am—no, no, it was somersaults."

I shut the door reverently, feeling I had stood in the presence of a Personality.

A GLIMPSE OF WELLESLEY FROM THE OUTSIDE.

There is a prevalent idea that Wellesley girls are more athletically than socially inclined, but we are assured that few could be more charming than the ladies of fair maidens who were being interviewed by our reporter last Saturday. These lovely seekers after higher education were dressed some in charmeuse, some in chiffon, and some in velvet. Our reporter was so dazzled by the burst of beauty which met his eyes that he had difficulty in maintaining his composure, but he managed to glean from a shy damsel whom he approached that the following was for Sue Persatiation, their senior president, who was sixteen years old on that day. Sue wore blue charmeuse with gold slippers and a single rose. On her fingers flashed a watch, which flashed in the electric light as she raised her white hand to adjust a jewelled comb. "I was born in Nova Scotia," she replied in answering the reporter's query. "My mother is 57 years old and my father 32. My grandfather is in the oil business. We moved to Holobok two years ago, where we are still living. When asked her opinion on woman's suffrage and on the war, she replied that she was too busy to enter strongly into the suffrage campaign, but that she did not absolutely disapprove of them, and that she thought she favored the bill in the present struggle. Sue Persatiation is 5 feet 9 inches tall, has brown hair and gray-green eyes, and is a Democrat. To judge from the merry laughter and bright conversation, a good time was had by all.

YOUNGSTERS LICK ALL-STARS.

19 (X-1) WINS BY CLOSE SCORE 1-0.

Red McTavish, supported by 8 picked players from the class of 19 (X-1), beat the former champion team of 19 (X-1) yesterday afternoon with a score of 1 to 0. Red was the whole cheer. Aside from holding the opponents scoreless and allowing only one hit, won her own game with a base run in the third inning. Up to that frame both sides had gone in one-two-three order and there were already two down when Red came to bat. Without delaying the heroism of the day stepped up to the plate and smacked the first ball pitched into the right field boppers for a trip around the bags. That ended the scoring for the day. For the next 5 innings Clis Hopkisson held the upper classmen helpless in the hollow of her hands. She had a hop on her fast balls, a kick on the curves, and the slow balls were so slow that the stitches on the cover could be counted. In the 9th inning the stuffed grennies garnered their only hit. After Tiny Todd had popped out to center, Big Betsy Bottleswarthen pushed a little Texas steamer over short, which Emily Skinner missed by the skin of her teeth. Big Betsy then stole second, but there she died, for McTavish pitched the speed of great ball lightning, and the absolute control of a German arm, ended the game by fanning Ward and Gsell.

The old ladies, vexed by their uncustomed exertions, were sent to their rooms as it grew dark, to their warm fireplaces and knitting.

MYSTERY OF WELLESLEY LADY SOLVED.

The mysterious appearance of a veiled lady has caused great consternation among the female residents of Wellesley. Until today, when the strange disappearance of books and pencils and essays from the students' rooms was explained, several restrictions were laid upon the young ladies and penalties imposed for their infringement. Chaperonage was required at all times when the girls left their dormitories. Not only was the usual array of gentlemen visitors refused admissittance to the Paradise of Wellesley's campus, but even the beloved mailmen was compelled to leave the mail in her hands. She got the books eagerly sought of a familiar handwriting. It made a pretty sight to see the gaily garbed maidens stroll along the well-kept paths with their more soberly dressed chaperones, and shut here and there behind doors and window peep through search of word from the Dear One(s). But it was evident that the young ladies chafed under these restrictions and rejoice now in their regained liberty.

The explanation of the mysterious actions of the Wellesley lady was found, however, in desperation, at the prolonged absence of her borrowed notebooks, pencils, and texts, one of the young ladies finally decided on this means of recovering from friends, her valuable property. This use of a dark veil and her coat, rumored to be borrowed from an unconsulted roommate, concealed her unworthy designs as effectually as was necessary, for she made use of the dinner hour in which to carry out her plan. Although it is said that her enterprise has been successful in locating and recovering articles of value loaned to friends, students have been officially advised to follow less subtle methods in the future, as this one has caused not only inconvenience to the faculty and students, but much trouble to the secret service department.

A BIT OF REALISM.

She was tall and strong-minded and looked very shockable. But we treated her with the utmost respect, for she was the Delegate.

"Won't you come into the News Office?" inquired the Newly Reporter, who had been told to care of her, while the Editor-in-Chief went to the gym, to confer with Miss Iva Conscience on the expediency of mentioning the Department of Moral Issues officer in the News. They dined after the student had responded with a hoist, which he dropped on the floor. And he turned and pulled. And finally the door opened. The Newly Reporter led the delegate in, and gave her a seat. She was just thinking of something pretty to say when the Delegate gave a start and began to listen.

"What's that?" she asked. The Newly Reporter listened, too, but could discern nothing unwavse.

"That pounding noise behind there," went on the Delegate, pointing to the northeast corner of the room.

"Why, that's only the addresograph and the minute book at work in the stencil room," informed the Newly Reporter. "They do that all the time."

"Oh!" said the Delegate. Then she listened again.

"What wishing overhand," was her explanation in answer to the Newly Reporter's inquiring glance.

"Why, that's the organ," said the Newly Reporter. "The choir is practicing hymns. The Chapel's upstairs, you know, so that we always work with an accompaniment."

"Oh!" said the Delegate. Then she spoke again. "Couldn't you show me the News Office now? I'm curious. "Don't wait for the Editor-in-Chief, I beg of you."

"Why, why, this is the News Office!" cried the Newly Reporter, taken almost off her feet by the revelation. "Don't you know the News and Masseaxx are lying around? and there's the type-writer, and—she went on desperately—and there are the ink-spots on the walls,—why, didn't you know this was the News Office?"

"Why, so it is!" blushed the Delegate. "I— I thought it was the back-number storeroom, but now I see my mistake. Why, of course it's the News Office—Oh! I'm jumped and dodged just in time to avoid being a falling object."

"I'm sorry you happened to be sitting there," apologized the Newly Reporter. "That's the Editor-in-Chief's flower vase and if not very deep that way off the shelf every time the wind blows."

Before the Delegate had time to sit down again a peculiar discord arose from without, and the Newly Reporter stood two chairs on a table in... order to provide a place high enough for the Delegate to look out the window.

"Maybe you can get a glimpse of them," she said to the Delegate, politely.

"No, I can't see anything," announced the Delegate.

"Where are they fighting?"

"Oh, it's not a fight," reassured the Newest Reporter. "It's only the violin and the soprano and the scales going at once over in Billings."

"Violin? Soprano? Scales?" echoed the Delegate.

"Billings!"

Before the Newest Reporter could explain more fully, the Editor-in-Chief arrived, surrounded by five members of the Faculty and two Heads of Organizations, all of whom were talking earnestly to her on subjects connected with Student Publications.

"I'm ever so glad to see you!" cried the Delegate with such fervor that the Newest Reporter's feelings began to quiver.

"You know, I think—" Just then two more expressmen fell in through the door with coal for the furnace, and in the slight misunderstandings which followed, the Delegate's thoughts doubtless suffered immediate change.

THE TRIALS OF A REPORTER. Episode XXVII.

The News came out two days late. The headlines weren't even startling. There was a two-column write-up of a math, lecture. There were two columns and a half (continued on last page) urging one to join something or other. The Parliament of Fools was wedged in between a huge Bonwit Teller and two or three shoemakers' advertisements. The editorial was about openhanded giving. There were two or three Free Press about freight trains and brick walks. The Alfred notices were all deaths or changes of address.

With one accord the House swooped down upon the lone Representative of the News who made his residence there.

"What's the matter with the News this week?" they cried angrily. "Can't you ever give us something interesting?" The poor Reporter, who was, by the way, very new, replied heavily that she didn't have a thing to do with it.

"But we're always open to suggestions, and more than delighted to receive frank criticism," she added glibly, quoting the Editor-in-Chief.

The House did not leave the Reporter in any doubt as to its ability to give frank criticism. And furthermore, the House was exceedingly liberal with suggestions. And since there were eighty-seven in the House, the Reporter was kept pretty busy conscientiously writing things down, for all the Board had promised the Editor-in-Chief to make note of criticisms heard around the campus.

Finally the House stopped from lack of breath. And then the Reporter got holdier.

"Why pick on me?" she asked. "I'm not the Editor."

"But you're a Reporter, and you can influence the Editor," the House replied.

The Reporter thought of the mighty Editor-in-Chief, who must have been Editor-in-Chief for years, and she felt very lippy to think that the House thought she could influence her. In fact she became so changed in her own opinion that she gained courage suddenly. "All of you get out of here," she announced in no mild tone of voice.

"Yes!" If you don't like the News, why, lump it—that's all! And the amazed House got out.

Even worse.

Dramatic Personae—Members of the News Board.

Synopsis—The contribution and mail boxes having been opened, the woefully small amount of material is mailed together with the regular reports to the printer in Framingham.

Act II.

Place—Same as Act I.

Time—The following Monday morning.

Synopsis—Additional material has come in by this time but not as much as might be expected since it was past the time designated for all contributions to be in. However the Editor is optimistic and is endeavoring to phrase a "which-up" while her associates are counting words and eliminating unnecessary commas from the last-minute articles. Meanwhile the printer's boy—familiarily known as the "dummy boy"—has entered, not unnoticed, and emits long sighs as he realizes that he has missed another trolley.

The Act has another day at the end of it and the boy deports.

Act III.

Place—Same as Acts I and II.

Time—Tuesday, 10 A. M., ad infinitum.

Synopsis—Various members of the Board and numerous Eleventh Hour contributors.

Synopsis—Confusion reigns. Two Board members wrapped round and round about by long galley sheets of proof attempt in spite of endless interruptions to make the necessary corrections. Two typewriters are mostly copying off two stacks of late communications, all of which have to be typed before being sent to the printer. While the Editor is vainly endeavoring to have her dummy made up in the approved style, the telephone jangles intermittently and late notices for the "next issue" are graciously received. In the early afternoon the boy is sent in for the dummy but the interruptions have been so numerous that the weary Business Manager机动 him to a seat and points to the Editor, who, mouth full of pipes, is making ineffective dots with her paste brush, as she tries to crown 35 inches of material into 3 inches of space. Some time before dark the boy is off again with the completed dummy under his arm. The work of the editors is over for that issue but—

SYNOPSIS

At Lakeview Press at Framingham.

Time—Wednesday.

Synopsis—The boy is late with the dummy and when he at last appears the great mass of late typewritten material must receive first attention. After the material is filedly on the printing press it takes some time for the actual printing. The folding and addressing of the copies is next done, also by machine, and at last the finished product is put into the mail.

ACT V AND LAST.

Place—Any College Dormitory.

Time—Thursday.

Synopsis—Subscribers.

Synopsis—Disappointment because the News is late is manifested. The mail man has come and gone and the expectant ones turn away from their mail boxes with a sigh for the incompetence of the News Board.

PROF. CALKINS HONORED.

At a meeting of the American Philosophical Association held in Princeton during the holidays, Professor Mary Wharton Calkins of the Philosophy Department was elected president for the year 1918. In 1905 Miss Calkins was president of the American Psychological Association. She is the first and only woman to hold either office and shares with the late Professors James and Rayner and only one or two other persons the honor of being president of both associations.
